More Canadians blame Arafat: poll

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Twice as many Canadians hold Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat rather than Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon responsible for the resurgence of Mideast violence, according to a survey by Léger Marketing. Among respondents who say they follow the conflict, 26 percent said Arafat is responsible, while 12 percent said Sharon is at fault.

Among the rest, 24 percent hold both men equally responsible and 38 percent either did not know or refused to answer.

Interpreted another way, Léger states that half of Canadians believe Arafat bears responsibility, while 38 per cent feel the same way about Sharon.

Sharon has his greatest number of critics in Quebec, where 18 percent hold him responsible for the renewed violence. Arafat is most likely to be singled out for blame in the Atlantic provinces (32 percent) and least likely in Manitoba/Saskatchewan (21 percent).Prairie respondents were also the least likely to finger Sharon (7 percent).

The study was conducted by phone among a representative sample of 1,521 English- and French-speaking Canadians, 18 and older, between Dec. 4 and Dec. 10. That was just after Palestinian suicide bombers killed 28 Israelis in two incidents over one weekend.

Léger says the results are accurate within a margin of plus or minus 2.6 per cent, 19 times out of 20. (The margin of error is higher for regional

"We Jews need to 'take back' Zionism from its critics. Not only must we not let them define us, we also cannot let our reaction to them define us. Too much modern Judaism is defined by our enemies - of yesterday and today. In taking back Zionism, we need to articulate a positive vision that speaks to us - and inspires us."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Definition Expanded

OTTAWA — Ottawa has expanded its list of suspected terrorist groups to include all elements of the Hamas organization. The federal government had previously excluded the charity arm of Hamas from its list of groups and individuals whose financial assets will be frozen if found in any Canadian financial institution. The charity arm was added to the list kept by the government's Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

ISRAEL

Bomber Visited

JERUSALEM — The man who allegedly tried to blow up an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami late last month using explosives in his shoe had visited Israel earlier in 2001, according to a report in the French newspaper Le Monde. The report said British national Richard Reid also visited Egypt and Turkey. Israeli security services and the FBI are investigating the purpose of Reid's stop in Israel seven months ago. Israeli Army Radio reported Reid was detained briefly at Ben-Gurion airport.

Prickly Situation

JERUSALEM — Israel's foreign ministry is hosting some prickly guests. Porcupines have moved into the ministry's compound in Jerusalem. While some ministry employees don't appreciate after-dark encounters with the creatures, a memorandum circulated by the Nature Reserves Authority assured workers the animals are timid and, contrary to popular myth, do not shoot their spines.

Tennis Title

JERUSALEM — An Israeli teenager has won a prestigious international girls tennis title. Shahar Peer, a 14-year-old from the town Maccabim, won the 14-and-under division at the Junior Orange Bowl championship in Miami.

WORLD

Delicacies Served

NEW YORK — Clean-up workers at Ground Zero recently enjoyed a taste of Israel recently when Israeli chef and TV personality Gil Hovav prepared a traditional Israeli breakfast for firefighters, police officers and construction workers. Working out of Nino's Restaurant in Manhattan, Hovav prepared shakshuka, an Israeli dish of fried eggs and tomato sauce. Two firefighters from Brooklyn said the food was different, but tasty.

Muslim Bomb

NEW YORK — The former president of Iran is calling on the Muslim world to develop nuclear weapons to annihilate Israel. At a recent lecture at Tehran University, Ali Hashem Rafsanjani said if "the world of Islam" obtains nuclear weapons, it should use them against Israel, whose second-strike capability is not enough to destroy the entire Muslim world, he said."Nothing will remain after one atom bomb is dropped on Israel, while a similar [retaliatory] attack would only hurt Islam," Rafsanjani said. Still one of the most powerful leaders in Iran, Rafsanjani described the founding of Israel as "the worst event in all of history."

Afghanistan Aid

JERUSALEM — Afghanistan's deputy president said her country would welcome Israeli humanitarian aid. But Sima Samar said she would prefer the aid come from non-governmental agencies. Samar, the only woman in Afghanistan's new government, said her country likely would consider diplomatic relations with Israel if Israel and the Palestinians come to a peace agreement.

Envoy Excess

LONDON — France's ambassador to Britain, Daniel Bernard, is being urged to resign after speaking about "that shitty little country Israel" at a private dinner party. The remark sparked outrage in Israel, where the prime minister's spokesperson called it "a pure anti-Semitic expression." Bernard did not deny the remark, insisting that what he said had been distorted. His spokesperson claimed he was referring only to Israel's small geographic size.

Real Estate Agent Regrets Flyer

GUELPH, Ont. — A real estate agent and his employer have announced they will apologize for a flyer the agent distributed in which he pointed out he is not Jewish.

Peter Ysselstein, a sales representative, and Re/Max Realty Specialists Inc. are attempting to mitigate the damage caused by the flyer, which was sent to about 200 Guelph homes last month to solicit home value estimates near the University of Guelph campus.

"And one last assumption," the back of the flyer stated in bold print. "Does the 'stein' in my last name automatically make me Jewish? Don't let 'stein' stop you from calling me for a 'Home Value' Estimate!"

Ysselstein admitted the comments on his flyer were "wrong" and he said he and his employer are working out an apology. Ysselstein is still working at the Guelph office.

"It definitely was wrong, because everybody had the same take on it, although maybe I only hear from the people that have a problem with it."

Ysselstein, who is not Jewish, said his name is of Dutch origin and had been a "lightning rod" that attracted anti-Jewish discrimination when he was growing up in Guelph.

Tory leadership hopefuls clash on tax credit

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's finance minister and would-be premier, Jim Flaherty, praised his government's tax credits for private school tuition before a meeting last month of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS). But earlier the same week, Ernie Eves, Flaherty's main rival for the Tory leadership, attacked the credit as "ludicrous" because it does not impose basic controls over curriculum.

Flaherty's stand is popular with Jewish education officials because he supports the tax credit almost unconditionally. But privately, some communal professionals warn of a looming battle with Eves, the frontrunner in the race to replace Premier Mike Harris. They worry that some Jewish schools, particularly chassidic yeshivot, may resist more controls over their curricula should Eves become premier and tighten eligibility criteria for the credit, as he has hinted.

Flaherty, addressing a Dec. 19 OAJDS meeting, repeated his view that the tax credit, which came into force Jan. 1 after seven months of ironing out regulations, is all about parental choice.

He said that when he introduced the measure in last May's budget, he knew "the education tax credit would be controversial.

"I knew that the opposition would attack it. But I thought then... and remain firmly of the view that the tax credit is based on an important principle: support for educational choice; support for parents who want their children to be educated in their own culture and religion; support for educational equality."

Starting this year, parents of children in Jewish day schools will be eligible for a tax credit of up to $700 per child, or 10 percent of the first $7,000 of tuition fees. To be phased in over the next five years, the credit will increase 10 percent per year, and by 2006, will be worth up to $3,500 per child annually.

The move will eventually return about $300 million a year to parents of the 102,000 students in Ontario's private schools, including the 12,000 children enrolled in 42 Jewish day schools and yeshivot.

Flaherty later told The CJN he supports the

A 'must buy' book

There are a number of sourcebooks, references, texts and films on the Middle East conflict to which we can all turn for invaluable guidance. A history of the Jewish people is a good place to begin. There are many reliable, well-written history texts, such as those authored by Heinrich Graetz, Solomon Grayzel, Simon Dubnov, Ben-Zion Dinur, Cecil Roth, H.H. Ben-Sasson, Jacob Katz, Howard Sacher and Paul Johnson, to name but a few.

Recently in this space, I wrote about two resources other than history texts that are very important sources of context and information for individuals interested in carrying the "battle" for public opinion on behalf of Israel.

One was the Web site of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) – www.cicweb.ca – which publishes highly instructive documents and other publications. The other was Myths and Facts: A Guide to the Arab-Israeli Conflict by Mitchell G. Bard.

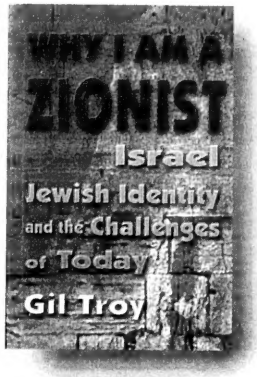
To this list must now be added the recently published Why I Am A Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today, by Gil Troy.

Since the start of the violent rejection of the Oslo Accords by the Palestinians some 15 months ago, Troy has emerged as the pre-eminent advocate for Israel on Canadian campuses and in the general media.

A professor of history at McGill University, Troy wears the mantle in Canadian academic and intellectual circles, so proudly, ably and elegantly worn in the United States by Ruth Wisse, as a bold, unabashed defender of Israel's legitimacy and right to exist as a free, sovereign Jewish State in the Muslim Middle East.

Troy's book is one of the most important works to appear on the subject of Jewish survival and continuity, at least since 1967. It is not an overstatement to join Zionism, the ostensible subject of the work, to Jewish survival and continuity. Troy uses the term Zionism in a wide, inclusive manner that begins with "peoplehood, history and homeland," and concludes with a discussion on a reinvigorated, modern Zionism geared to Jews both in Israel and in the Diaspora.

Troy writes in a direct, forthright manner, in language that is as clear as sunlight in a noontime summer sky in Jerusalem. He never avoids or evades difficult issues. His arguments are forceful but never overbearing. Moreover, and perhaps most refreshing, Troy is never defensive about Israel or Israel's cause. When there are blemishes on Israel's record, he acknowledges them. But he refuses to allow the enemies of Israel to distort that record as if it only had such blemishes.



The book has its genesis in the morally inverted world that once again, alas, wields truth topsy-turvy, upside down, as a sword against the Jewish State.

Like many of us, Troy was shocked at the nature and extent of the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric that has returned from the malodorous sinkholes of a former time. But unlike most of us, he has decided to take action.

This book arises from that action.

From its very first pages, the book glistens with high thought and inspiration. In the prologue, Troy tells how and why it was written.

He reproduces his famous shining essay I am a Zionist: A Twenty First Century Manifesto, the reactions it evoked, and his personal call-to-arms that resulted from those reactions.

The book is a specially effective armament for students on campus, where the vitriol against the Jews and the Jewish State has been the most poisonous.

Indeed, Troy has included an appendix that tells the reader "how to talk about Israel on campus and elsewhere without apologizing, cringing, crying or yelling." It should be made available for all our students on campuses throughout Canada.

Why I am a Zionist flows with facts, argument, history and context like a strong river whose unwavering current is able to smash the menacing rocks that lurk mostly hidden in its path.

Helping to make the book even more illuminating is the renowned Israeli illustrator of the Jerusalem Report, Avi Katz, whose many drawings add poignant visual accents to Troy's writings.

All of the author's royalties from the book will be donated to the Israeli MIA families' individual efforts to free their children. All other profits from the book will be donated to the Birthright Israel program. Why I am a Zionist can be ordered from the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre in Montreal by phone at: 514-345-2610, by fax at: 514-735-2175 or by email at: bjec@bjec.org.

There is no more informative, exciting, impassioned and inspiring voice today on Israel's behalf than Troy's. His book is a must buy.

Sept. 11 changed people for good, says famed rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Harold Kushner's curiosity about people goes back as far as he can remember.

The bestselling author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People and rabbi laureate of Temple Israel in Natick Mass. said that from an early age, he always found characters to study in literature. "I enjoy learning what makes people tick."

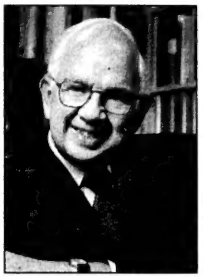
He was here recently to speak at Temple Sinai about his latest book, Living a Life that Matters, a talk originally scheduled for Sept. 11.

In an interview before his talk, Rabbi Kushner said he has observed a change in people since the terrorist attacks, but he can't say if the change is permanent.

"In the United States, we've had taken away from us the feeling of American exceptionalism.

"People who have believed that terrible things will not happen to them, have joined the rest of the world [in their feeling] of vulnerability."

We have learned that there are limits to what human ingenuity and technology can control, he said. "There is something religious about that. God begins where human self-sufficiency ends.



Rabbi Kushner

"People start believing in God when they [realize they] do not have the power they want. [Since Sept. 11] more people have recognized the need for God."

They have also recognized that there is no greater priority than their family, he said.

The Sept. 11 hijackers were not evil people, said Rabbi Kushner. "They were fanatics. They were misguided people who were sent [to their deaths] by someone evil."

Human beings differ from other creatures, he said, in that they can understand the difference between good and evil.

"There are choices we can make, and these choices are significant because we have a finite amount of time. We have no time to make other choices."

Everyone has the potential to do bad things, he said, and there are some who choose to exalt in death and destiny instead of life.

"There are, however, few people like that. Those who enjoy the suffering of other people are a different breed of creatures."

He believes, however, "that you cannot be a complete person without having to wrestle your own demons... Like the man or woman who lifts weights at the gym to become stronger, we strengthen our moral fibre by the exercise of resisting temptation."

As a congregational rabbi for 24 years, he said, he spoke to a lot of people who were unhappy because of moral compromises they had to make to attain certain goals. "They were like Jacob in the Bible who is ashamed of having deceived his father, and who cheated his brother to get ahead."

In the past three months, he said in his talk, it has been difficult to believe in the goodness of the world, and it has been hard "to get up and come to synagogue.

"God never promised, though, that life would be fair. He promised that when we had to face pain we would not have to face it alone."

The premise of his latest book, he said, is that human beings need to feel significant; they need to feel that they are taken seriously by the world.

"This craving for significance is why artists labour over the right colour, and musicians labour over the right note.

"People reveal themselves on talk shows because for one hour, they have held the attention of the audience; they have been significant."

Alongside the need to be significant, he said, is the need to be good. "These are two parallel needs, and if one is lucky, they will never conflict."

People can change the world for the good, he said, if they join with other people and do it together. "If thousands of people work with each other, they can make a difference.

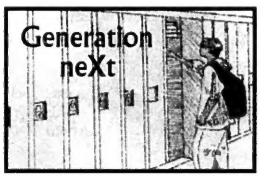
"Not everyone has to be a star. [It is also good] to be best actor in a supporting role. That is how we make good things happen, how we can make an impact on the world. We have no way of knowing the implications of [the sum total of many] little deeds of kindness."

People who really want to make a difference, he said, need to start with the people closest to them. "Love the people around you. Change people's lives by inviting them to change yours. Reach out to those closest to you and love them."

The turning point

By MARK DANIELS and JASON ROTSTEIN

As we approach a turning point in our education, we are faced with the dilemma of what we will become. We say, with confidence, that the choice, ultimately, lies in our hands; we alone can shape our destiny. With new opportunities arising at every turn, we are, for the first time, called upon to explore our nature in an effort to determine our identity.



As one chapter of our lives draws to a close, another abruptly begins. Adolescents strive for autonomy and adulthood. We are the authors of our autobiographies; the course taken is as direct or as circumventive as we choose. We are the sum total of our experiences.

In our youngest and most impressionable years, before we enter grade school, we rarely defy the intrinsic values of our role models, namely, our parents. Statistically, only a small percentage of Jewish children brought up in a relatively religious environment even consider intermarriage. However, as our intellectual horizons broaden, we instigate the important decisions which govern our lives. When unleashed upon the real world, we begin to question the importance of our Jewish values. The idealism of our childhood encounters the practicality of the real world, and it is necessary to reach a compromise; we begin to question those beliefs which had previously been undeniable.

It is here that our tradition is seriously called into question; this is evident from the high rates of assimilation and acculturation in North America. We must keep an open mind in our approach to life. Yet, at the same time, we must continue to preserve and develop the traditions of our fathers and forefathers. The youth of today will shape the Jewry of tomorrow – if we do not preserve our Jewish heritage, there is a danger of it becoming extinct.

The values that are central to our generation vary greatly from those of our parents. It is our primary task to discover an instrument of change that will unite our generation of Jewry in the same way that the Yom Kippur War and the Six Day War consolidated our parents' generation. We have seen how the war against America, stemming from the Sept. 11 attacks, has prompted a revolutionary posture of national pride and patriotism. It is not our choice as Jews to promote solidarity for Israel but our overwhelming obligation to strengthen our ties. Who are we without the security and safety of our Jewish homeland? In the history of the Jewish people, there has always been a force seeking to impede our progress as a nation. As Jews, we must accept the heavy responsibility of our past, discover our identity and proceed from it.

It is impossible to deny that the needs and feelings of Jewish youth are changing. Nevertheless, at the same time, we remain the products of our nurturing friends, family and teachers. Among us walk the Einsteins and the Freuds, the Jewish leaders of tomorrow, who will shape the next generation.

Mark Daniels and Jason Rotstein are students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Leonard Asper defends CanWest vision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A little over a year ago, when the Asper family collectively made the decision to acquire the Canadian assets of the Hollinger newspaper group, they knew the purchase would raise eyebrows among those concerned about corporate concentration of the news media.

Then, when CanWest Global Communications, the Asper-controlled media giant, recently required its chain of 13 Southam newspapers (acquired from Hollinger) to run one editorial per week penned in the company's home base in Winnipeg, the editorial staff at the Montreal Gazette howled in protest. Other media watchers weighed in that the imposition of centrally-determined editorials – eventually numbering three a week – would reduce the diversity of voices reflecting the communities served by the papers.

Two years into his stint as CanWest Global's CEO and president, Leonard Asper is learning the hard way what it's like to be the target of outraged critics. The latest round of controversy is nothing new for him. As head of one of Canada's largest media companies, he's already locked horns with opponents who argue Global TV spends too little on news and domestic programming.

In a wide-ranging interview in CanWest's Winnipeg head office, and later in a telephone interview, Asper addressed those concerns, arguing the attacks on Global's spending patterns are the work of proxy spokespeople speaking on behalf of rival networks.

The acquisition of prime Hollinger assets, along with the purchase of WIC television stations and a 100-percent interest in the National Post, pushed CanWest's debt into the $4-billion range, and prompted it to pressure the money-losing National Post to stem the paper's flow of red ink.

"We knew it would put some debt in the company, change its profile for a number of years. And we knew it would put us more in the public spotlight," Asper acknowledged.

Speaking prior to the announcement of the centrally-mandated editorial policy, Asper agreed that local newspapers are best able to gauge the important issues in each community.

CanWest's policy is to "give editors and station managers a fair bit of leeway on a number of issues. You have to let the people in the local markets understand their readership, the local issues, and make the call themselves."

Speaking after the Gazette controversy erupted, Asper said, "given the number of editorials written every day, the local editors have the final decision on 90 percent of the material that gets into the paper."

The editorials from head office are on "matters of national affairs, where we feel there should be a Canadian view instead of a regional, parochial view."

There is no stifling of dissent, he continued. The newspapers will be free to run contrary opinions on their commentary pages. And even though the papers' "editorial position may be pro-Israel, that does not mean that good, sound opposing material can't appear."

Leonard Asper

Speaking prior to the controversy, Asper said, "even if there was one editorial opinion in all the CanWest properties – which is physically impossible – but assume even if it was, there are so many sources [of information] today. What CanWest owns is just one of the apples in the barrel."

With the acquisition of the Hollinger properties to go along with its stable of television stations, CanWest is certainly one of the biggest apples in the barrel. But in the late 1960s, when Leonard's father, Israel (Izzy), launched CKND in Winnipeg, the Asper media holdings consisted of that single, independent station in a mid-sized market.

Over the years, CanWest Global was criticized for its heavy emphasis on American sitcoms, but Asper says that was part of the company's survival and growth strategy. In the mid-1970s, the company was in dire financial straits and "had to play Love Boat five times [a day] to pay the bills," Leonard said.

"We built the Global franchise in the 1970s and '80s through U.S. programming that funded the loss-making Canadian programming," he added.

By the 1990s, CanWest was investing more in Canadian programming, and some of its shows proved commercially successful, including Traders, Blue Murder and Andromeda.

Now, Asper said, "there comes a time of maturity in the CanWest organization when we can focus on news."

With the acquisition of the WIC stations, Global can be considered a national broadcaster, but the Aspers' goals are for more: "We desperately want a CBC Newsworld-type channel" and a specialty business channel, he said.

The end game for this ambitious growth phase – at least on television – would be to host "a group of channels we can move viewers back and forth from."

With a host of media properties to draw on, the natural evolution would be towards convergence, Asper continued.

Convergence is a buzzword that really animates him.

There's more than one kind of convergence, he points out. "We are not trying for the vertical integration" where a media company acquires content for its broadcast arm. "We are pursuing what we call horizontal integration, trying to take exhibitive advertising platforms across various media and bring better content to them."

In layman's terms, that would include sales and cross-promotions through various outlets, such as directing Global's TV viewers to CanWest's canada.com Web site or to the National Post.

Warming to the topic, Asper points to a new role for journalists in which they will be expected to be comfortable in various media-delivery platforms. That might mean a Calgary print reporter providing up-to-date news coverage for a TV broadcast out of Halifax. Not only would that provide "a much better product, because we have a bigger news pool," there are financial benefits as well, he said.

Instead of Global TV, the National Post and Southam papers all sending reporters to a single news event, perhaps only one journalist will draw that assignment, freeing the others to cover different stories.

And offering advertisers a number of platforms – TV, newspapers, the Internet – to deliver their product is a big advantage when advertisers and media buyers are co-ordinating their campaigns, he added.

"It's a new source of profits to the company," he continued. "It won't happen overnight... Convergence selling is a journey. It's a process, not an event."

Developing CanWest's vision and strategy clearly excites Asper, but it's still the family patriarch, Izzy, executive chair of CanWest, who must sign off on all major decisions.

Izzy also sets the direction in another sphere in which the family looms large: philanthropy.

Last November, the Winnipeg Foundation and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba announced a $20-million gift, to be split equally between them, from Izzy Asper and the Asper family. It is the largest single monetary gift in the charities' histories.

The gifts are a part of a much larger list of donations by the Aspers to a variety of charities, ranging from theatre groups to the Jewish community.

His father is the driving force behind the charitable impulse, Leonard said. "The way he described it is that his parents were immigrants who came with nothing." Fleeing European pogroms to safety in Canada, "they felt they were treated very well by an open and tolerant society.

"They instilled a sense in my father that the only thing one can do is to give back... He's passionately lived by these morals all his life."

Now, he continued, "it's just a family value, a core value... It's as axiomatic to us as breathing and eating."

The three Asper children – Leonard, Gail and David – are all involved in the Asper Foundation. One of the foundation's key programs is the "Joshua Project," which focuses on helping aboriginals in Winnipeg's downtown core to improve their lives.

A lawyer by training, Leonard also serves on the boards of the Asper Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg, the Sharon Home, the Business Council of Manitoba and the Canada West Foundation.

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

Aliyah shaliach faces challenges with equanimity

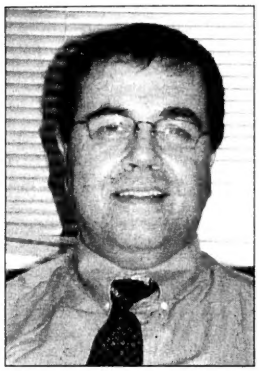
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gadi Anavi is unfazed by the impact of the current intifadah on his work as regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre.

Israel's a tough sell now, he admits. But he's not here to talk people into making aliyah, he says. "I'm here to give a service. People will move to Israel because they want to, and because they believe it's what they should do."

If Anavi – who succeeded Offer Isseroff in November – can help one oleh, he will feel he has succeeded, he said. But if the past year is any indication, he will be called on to assist many times that number.

Since the intifadah began in Sept. 2000, 83 people have made aliyah through his office, which serves Ontario and Western Canada, excluding Vancouver, which has its own aliyah centre.



Gadi Anavi

Anavi, 47, doesn't believe his job description has changed since before the intifadah, "for the simple reason that Israel – no matter when, even in the good days when the peace process was happening and people believed this was taking us to a new era – there was violence in the Middle East, there were terrorist attacks on Israel, there were ups and downs. For me, I take the current situation as something that will end."

Although the situation in Israel "looks bad; still, life in Israel is pretty good," said Anavi.

Those currently making aliyah include a significant number who are affiliated with Orthodox or Conservative Judaism, as well as university-age olim whose parents lived in Israel at some point.

Very few, to his knowledge, move outside the Green Line. As aliyah shaliach, he neither encourages nor discourages such moves. "I give them the facts, which are [that] in some settlements definitely you get good services, the education can be good, but there is always a risky side. The settlements are under attack. It's very difficult to travel from place to place, [especially] at night, and they're at the centre of a political argument between Israel and the Arab world. It has nothing to do with opinions. It's up to them to decide."

His own mother escaped from Transylvania to Israel at age 17 in 1943. Her brother had been executed the day before she left, and a neighbour told her that she was next, said Anavi.

His late father emigrated around the same time, from Egypt via Lebanon and Sicily.

Coincidentally, Anavi was working for the Jewish Agency in the early 1990s when he learned of an opening for a Canadian Young Judaea shaliach in Montreal. He served in that position from 1990 to 1993. The organization's Israeli counterpart, Hanoar Hatzioni, was the group with that helped his mother escape wartime Europe.

Anavi himself was never involved in youth movements as a youngster. Living in Eilat, he explained, it was "the end of the world. There were no youth movements. Just desert."

After studying political science and Far Eastern studies at Hebrew University, Anavi returned to Eilat and worked in his father's business before joining Israel's ministry of education and working in the field of informal education.

Following his stint in Montreal, he served as director of an absorption centre for Ethiopian olim in Kiryat Gat, and then returned to the North American desk of the Jewish Agency's aliyah department in Jerusalem.

Being well prepared is key to successful aliyah, Anavi believes. He encourages prospective olim to visit Israel and live for a while as Israelis before making aliyah. "The more you prepare, the better."

The aliyah centre offers a number of Israel programs for potential olim. Anavi is working on developing an internship program for people age 35 and over, so they can experience life in Israel in their own line of work. He also hopes to start an intensive Hebrew ulpan here.

Anavi doesn't believe that cultural differences between Canadians and Israelis are a major issue, although dealing with bureaucracy requires different tactics. In Israel, you "may have to raise your voice" to get results, but overall, Anavi says, "it's not such a big gap. It looks deeper than it is."

REPUBLIC OF AUSTRIA
Allgemeiner Entschädigungsfonds für Opfer des Nationalsozialismus

The Republic of Austria has established a General Settlement Fund endowed with USD 210 million, which will be administered by the National Fund of the Republic of Austria. The purpose of the Fund is to acknowledge, through voluntary payments, the moral responsibility for losses and damages inflicted upon Jewish citizens and other victims of National Socialism as a result of or in connection with the National Socialist regime.
Eligibility: Persons and associations who/which were persecuted by the National Socialist regime or who left the country to escape such persecution and who suffered losses or damages as a result of or in connection with events having occurred on the territory of the present-day Republic of Austria during the National ocialist era are eligible to file an application. Heirs of such persons and legal successors of defunct associations are also eligible.

HAVE YOU BEEN A VICTIM OF NATIONAL SOCIALISM?

CATEGORIES OF PROPERTY: Applications for compensation of losses or damages may be filed in the following categories:
- liquidated businesses, including licenses and other business assets
- real property
- bank accounts, stocks, bonds and mortgages
- movable property unless such property losses are covered by the payments for apartment and small business leases, household property and personal valuables and effects
- insurance policies
- occupational or educational losses
- any other claims for losses or damages unless those claims are already covered by the Austrian Reconciliation Fund for former slave and forced labourers or by in rem restitution

IN REM* RESTITUTION: Applications for in rem restitution of real estate (land) and buildings (in case of Jewish organizations also tangible movable property) which were owned by the Federal Government or the City of Vienna on January 17, 2001, may be filed with an Arbitration Panel established with the Fund.

DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS: You may file applications in writing until May 27, 2003.

Dry Bones

A week when justice was mocked

Once, when dousing the fire of an impassioned debate in the House of Commons, Benjamin Disraeli proclaimed that "justice is truth in action." It was a pithy but nevertheless profound statement by the wily politician. Using the Disraeli formula that relates justice to truth, we must bitterly observe that justice suffered a number of setbacks last week.

In three different parts of the world, in three different ways, justice was invoked. Yet in each case it was "justice" severed from truth.

Justice as politics. The trial against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon resumed last week in Brussels. Under a law of the Belgian parliament passed in 1993 enabling Belgian courts to hear cases of atrocities, including crimes against humanity and genocide, Sharon has been accused by a number of Palestinians for the murders in 1982 of Palestinian refugees in Sabra and Shatilla, Lebanon.

That Elie Hobeika, currently a prominent member of the Lebanese parliament, and the head of the unit of the Phalange militia that actually committed the murders has not been charged, is proof beyond doubt that the process in Brussels has more to do with politics than with justice. It is not merely coincidence that the language of the complaints filed against Sharon in Brussels is the same as that of the anti-Israel, NGO resolutions in Durban. Brussels is simply another battlefield in which the campaign against Israel is being waged.

Justice as hatred. Osama bin Laden, once again, managed to ferret a video of himself to the Qatari television station Al Jazeera that willingly broadcast his self-serving, twisted message around the world.

"How many villages were annihilated without committing any crime?... Those who claim to uphold humanitarian values and freedom, we saw their true criminal nature... Our terrorism against the United States is blessed, aimed at repelling the oppressor so that America stops its support for Israel," bin Laden asked the videographer.

What "crime," one plaintively asks bin Laden did the 3,000 Americans murdered on Sept. 11 commit, that their deaths were hailed as "blessed?" Perverse and perfidious is his alchemy that converts raw hatred of the Jew into "blessed terrorism."

Justice as revenge. In Tehran, the judicial council sent a pro-reform member of parliament, Hossein Loqmanian, to jail for "insulting the judiciary." Loqmanian was sentenced to 13 months in prison; the sentence was affirmed on appeal.

The head of the judicial council is appointed by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei. Last year, he and his hard-line ruling clerics have intimidated, through false accusation, some 60 "reformist" members of the 280-member Parliament. Loqmanian was the first to actually be convicted and sentenced. In Iran, justice is the revenge judges wield against those who dare to speak their minds.

Were Disraeli alive today, he would have no difficulty agreeing that it was a bad week for justice, a week when justice was mocked.

Government should be accountable

In her column (CJN, Dec. 20), Shira Herzog writes that for the first time, some Canadian Jews are questioning the Israeli government's tolerant perspective on Canada's Middle East policy. She suggests that Israel's interests require that Canadian Jews remain complacent in the face of Canada's voting record at the United Nations, if that is the position taken by Israeli diplomats. While Ms. Herzog pays lip service to Canadians' right to be more critical of Canada than Israel is, the difference, in her view, should be subtle at best.

That Israel, for the most part, expresses appreciation for Canada's role in Middle East diplomacy is not particularly surprising. In judging UN voting records, Israel has no choice but to be guided by the aphorism, "In the land of the blind, the one-eyed man is king." In the context of its fellow UN members, including the Europeans, Canada comes out looking respectable.

Canadians, however, including Canadian Jews, are entitled to expect better.

We want our government to be guided by the standards of democracy and freedom, the guiding principles of this country. Moreover we want our government to be an influence for peace. A litany of one-sided and distorted attacks on Israel should not be met with affirmative votes or even abstentions from Canada. As we have seen, the abuse of the UN structures as a stick to beat Israel merely encourages Palestinian intransigence and violence, and delays the prospect of real peace.

Israel may not be in a position to criticize Canada's voting, but Canadians are. The government of Canada must understand that it cannot defend its amorality in the Middle East by resorting to the claim that the Israelis are satisfied.

Our community should, by all means, praise the positive aspects of Canadian policy. But on its shameful UN voting practices as indeed, on everything it does, the government should be held to account by Canadian citizens. That is our right and our responsibility.

Comparing PA to Taliban valid

The horrific attacks last month on Israeli citizens in Jerusalem and Haifa by murderous Palestinian terrorists can aptly be compared to the Sept.11 assaults on New York and Washington. In both incidents, the victims were non-combatants and were killed or maimed within the national borders of Israel and the United States and not in the so-called occupied territories. One can then equate Palestinian Authority with the Taliban, Hamas and Islamic Jihad with Al Qaeda and Yasser Arafat with Osama bin Laden. Arafat and bin Laden have long and vicious records as terrorists and Israel's response in targeting his Gaza and West Bank headquarters is as appropriate as what the United States and its allies are doing in Afghanistan.

Countries that harbour terrorists in the rest of the world should beware.

Jewish right deserves respect

More Israelis have been killed by terrorists in the eight years since the Oslo "peace process" than in the previous 45 years! This leads to two conclusions. Firstly, the proponents of Oslo owe Jews a huge apology for bringing on this scourge. To their credit, some have. A number of members of Israel's Shas Party have publicly apologized for supporting Oslo.

Secondly, it is way past time to reduce the amount of press given to the perenially wrong Jewish left and give much more press to proud Jewish nationalists. The Jewish right deserves more respect and positive coverage than it has been getting. It is time to completely abandon the disastrous policy of appeasement. Israel's problems with the Palestinians will not be solved over a negotiating table any more than the problems the Allies had with the Nazis or America has with Osama bin Laden. That is the hard truth.

Canadian Jews can dissent too

I would like to register my surprise and consternation at the recent remarks of my colleague, Prof. Morton Weinfeld, in his column called "Anti-Zionism and the Jewish Community" (CJN, Dec. 20).

It is not that I disagree with his arguments. Far from it. A dismantling of the Jewish State makes sense neither to Israelis nor to Diaspora Jews.

What worries me is his readiness to rule out a person from the Jewish community who might be opposed to political Zionism. There is something in this that makes shivers run up and down my spine. Is Weinfeld advocating that the Jewish community close ranks and ostracize anyone who would dare to write or say something that is opposed to the mainstream wisdom? Does Weinfeld really think that Israel's cause is best served by trying to stifle dissent within the Canadian Jewish community? Is he not aware that in Israel itself there is a fierce debate going on in the press as to Israel's future course? Are these people less Israeli, less Jewish than other citizens? Are Israelis allowed freedom to dissent, but not Canadian Jews? I would humbly suggest that Israel is immersed in the painful process of learning how to live alongside the millions of Palestinians who inhabit the same land. Some adjustment to Zionist thinking will have to be made in order to make that accommodation. It need not be an abandonment of the idea of a Jewish state, but it will surely require some fresh and innovative thinking. Let us remember the strengths of a free and democratic society and open our minds, and the pages of our press, to new ideas, even if they trouble and discomfort us.

Balmy weather

Except for those who sell winter wear, it seems that people are generally delighted to have experienced such a mild fall. Balmy weather in the beginning of winter is certainly a welcome guest. Or is it?

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

All would be well if it were a temporary aberration, but if it is not, it is incumbent upon us to take the long view and, in that view, the balmy weather is a momentary delight, but a long-range curse.

If you ask the professionals in the weather business their opinion, you are likely to get a rather pessimistic answer. They are afraid that what we are witnessing is the beginning of a long-term trend which is potentially dangerous and even catastrophic.

If these pessimists are right, we are seeing the early effects of global warming – and that should frighten rather than delight us. For, in the long run, global warming will turn into global disaster. The normal course of nature will be upset. Our seasons will lose their characteristics, and the changes all of this will bring about will eventually be devastating.

What, then, can we do? If enough of us ask these questions and require the experts to give us some answers, we will have fulfilled a responsibility that we cannot disregard.

For hundreds of millions of years, we humans have been spectators in the arena of nature, but of late we have been active participants and in so doing have brought about some undesirable changes.

The Torah tells us that we have been put on earth to enjoy its benefits, but we have tried to do more than that; we have tried to manage it, and I fear that we have overreached ourselves. The balmy weather that has greeted us this fall is a temporary pleasure, but, in my opinion, a long-range warning.

The Almighty has given us the faculty of reason to discern between good and evil – not only in our personal behaviour but also in our impact on our environment. Yes, I too enjoyed the mildness of the fall, but I have shared with you my worries about it. I hope that if many of us worry about it, perhaps we will get back to where we belong: children of nature and not its managers.

I am writing this column during the festival of Chanukah. When you read these lines, the festival will be over, but I hope it will have brought you a sense of wellbeing and joy – and may the rest of the winter be good to all of us.

Yasser's last stand? Don't bet on it

For a moment there, it looked like it might be curtains for Israel's longtime nemesis, Yasser Arafat.

A few weeks ago, after a particularly deadly wave of terrorist attacks in Jerusalem and Haifa, the Palestinian Authority leader was on the ropes. Having done next to nothing to fight terrorism despite his many promises to the contrary, Arafat was scorned and isolated by Israel and reprimanded by the United States. Even the Yasser-friendly European Union gave him a slap on the wrist. With his international stature in tatters and even some of his colleagues contesting his decisions, many pundits and politicians in Israel were writing off the wily little PA chairman. They should have known better.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Arafat is nothing if not an artful survivor. Since taking charge of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1968, he has outlasted countless Israeli prime ministers, U.S. presidents and other world leaders. He has survived assassination attempts, overcome his many diplomatic blunders and even walked away from a plane crash in which others died.

His staying power is remarkable, as is his ability to command attention at home and abroad. Judging by his huge presence in the media, Arafat remains a superstar, albeit a dubious one. There's no escaping him. Rare is the day that he does not enter Israeli homes on the nightly news. And with a face only a beleaguered Palestinian could love, there's no mistaking his less than inviting appearance. Yet it obviously has not prevented him from becoming a poster boy of the Arab world, the darling of the United Nations and international media and a welcomed guest in most foreign capitals.

Recently, the Sharon government tried to wish Arafat away, when it issued a formal statement, saying it was cutting off all contact with him, declaring him "no longer relevant". I can think of many ways to describe Arafat, but irrelevant is not one. It's far more accurate to say he is a chronic liar and a Machiavellian manipulator. Or a corrupt and incompetent dictator. Or a shrewd performer who speaks with a forked tongue, inciting his people in Arabic to hatred and war against Israel while paying lip service in English to his so-called "peace of the brave." Or an incorrigible terrorist who regards Palestinian violence as a strategic asset to be used to win more concessions from Israel.

He is all of the above and a lot more, but irrelevant he's not. Assuming that ill health or a bullet don't do him in first, Arafat won't be leaving the scene any time soon. We're stuck with him.

In addition to his often-inscrutable manner, there's something pathetically comical about Arafat and the buffoonish way he often acts. If only the situation were not so volatile and fraught with dire consequences, he might be more amusing. Unfortunately, he's no laughing matter. He has far too much Jewish blood on his hands for that.

Today, 15 months after launching a terrorist war that so far has killed nearly 250 Israelis, any sympathy Arafat may have previously enjoyed from Jews has been destroyed. Those on the left, both in Israel and abroad, have been especially disillusioned.

Arafat even manages to offend Israelis when yielding to international pressure to condemn Palestinian atrocities. With hollow words, he and his cohorts criticize the attacks in tactical terms as being "against the Palestinian national interest." They never denounce the mass killings as immoral and despicable, but simply as damaging the Palestinian cause.

In mid-December, Arafat gave a lengthy interview to Israel Television as part of his charm offensive. He was asked if he had a message for the Israeli public. While thinking of an answer, one of his aides, unseen but clearly audible, prodded his boss to say, "I offer my hand in peace." That was about as convincing as many of his past supposedly conciliatory statements.

As much as Israelis may mistrust and despise Arafat, there's no getting around him if we hope to end the current conflict with the Palestinians any time soon. As he's demonstrated before, Arafat holds the key to halting the violence against Israel. He is still the only Palestinian who can make, and deliver, a peace agreement with Israel. That doesn't correspond to irrelevance in my books.

Defending the Concordia syndrome

University campuses in North America and Europe are very hostile environments for Jewish students and others who support Israel. Since 1967, the self-styled "intellectual classes" have adopted the cause of Palestinian victimization, combining massive ignorance with a political orthodoxy that blocks any debate. Demonstrations and seminars that echo Palestinian propaganda and Arab anti-Semitism are everyday events. When it comes to Israel and the Middle East, many universities are more like indoctrination centers than educational institutions.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Concordia University in Montreal is the most outrageously anti-Israeli campus in Canada and perhaps North America, and its academic activities are dwarfed by the pro-Palestinian events and atmosphere. The Arab lobby, supported by Arab governments and Islamic groups, brings in a stream of speakers and professional political activists. A well-funded group known as Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights exploited campus apathy to capture the Concordia student government, and then used compulsory student fees to publish and distribute propaganda. These fees pay for pamphlets entitled From Sabra and Shatilla to the Intifada and calendars with May 15 (Israeli Independence Day) labeled as "Nakba day" (the Arab term for disaster).

Supported by infamous malcontents and self-hating Jews such as Noam Chomsky, universities in Montreal and campuses elsewhere are flooded with pseudo-academics with Israeli-sounding names who promote the "Zionism-isracism" campaign.

Enemies of Israel cover the campuses with posters repeating the great lies of Palestinian victimization – "occupied Palestinian land," "stones versus tanks," "right of return," and "Israeli violations of international law." Socially maladjusted students, whose concepts of morality excuse the mass murder of Americans and Israelis, and who walk incongruously around Montreal in kaffiyehs, provide useful allies. While they know next to nothing, for members of this group, any cause that is anti-globalization and anti-American gets their support.

Despite this very hostile environment, a small but growing number of very committed Jewish students are fighting back. Response teams that receive training from the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and groups such as Hillel organize seminars and prepare publications presenting the Israeli perspective and facts that expose the Palestinian myths.

When the CIC brought me to Concordia recently, students covered the Arab propaganda posters with huge announcements of my seminar, including an eye-catching photo of Palestinian children clustered around a tank aimed outward – clearly exposing the myth of innocent and unarmed Palestinian victimization. The title that they chose for this talk, Coping with Palestinian Terror, highlighted the real source of the violence. And despite the timing of my talk during exam period, they turned out to ensure that the presentation would not be interrupted by hecklers.

A concerted effort at Concordia has recently led to a change in control of the student government, after many students began to recognize the declining value of a degree from this university. This was an important victory, but it is only the first step to reversing years of neglect.

Jewish student groups are grossly underfunded, compared to the money and resources available for anti-Israeli propaganda. Workshops on changing the agenda from discussions of Palestinian victimization to talk of Palestinian terrorism and incitement and on how to use the Internet to find accurate information that is often hidden by the media (usually reported by journalists who are trained in the same universities and centres that are dominated by Arab propagandists) need to be held a few times a year.

The Jewish students from Halifax to Vancouver who are fighting these battles require support from local communities and national leadership across the spectrum of community organizations. Most Jewish faculty, some very well known in their disciplines, are silent or studiously neutral, and victims of the brainwashing that has swept the campuses and media. An effective offensive to restore some balance requires a long-term program and extensive cooperation between students, faculty and community leaders. The results will also echo in the media and among Canadian government officials, who often take their cues from the Arabist academic establishment.

If we can take back the campuses, we can begin to turn the tide in this war on other fronts.

The Kirshner File

IBM's census machines helped the Nazis

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Criss-crossed with slots, wires and circuits, it had been used by Nazi Germany in a national census to pick out German Jews.

Being the son of Polish Holocaust survivors, he wondered whether this innocuous-looking device had been put to use to still darker purposes.

Eight years on, Black, an American journalist who wrote a syndicated column for North American Jewish newspapers in the 1980s, still remembers the moment when he turned to his parents and promised them that he would try to discover more about that machine.

Little could he have known that this pledge would exact five years of his life. Backed by a team of 100 volunteers, researchers and scholars working in some 50 archives in seven countries, Black launched himself on a campaign to trace the relationship between IBM (International Business Machines) and Nazi Germany from 1933 until 1945.

"I was fortunate to have an understanding of Third Reich economics and multinational commerce from my earlier book, The Transfer Agreement," he said.

Published in 1984, The Transfer Agreement was a blow-by-blow account of a 1933 deal with the devil signed by Nazi Germany and Zionist leaders in Palestine. Under the accord, Jews dropped their boycott of German goods in exchange for German Jews being allowed to immigrate to Palestine.

IBM and the Holocaust, published recently by Random House, is a troubling account of the mutually profitable business alliance this powerful, iconic American company – and its European subsidiaries – concocted with a regime whose demonization, ostracization, persecution, expulsion and murder of Jews has no parallel in history.

Indeed, it is the first comprehensive book about IBM's intricate ties with Nazi Germany. "Holocaust literature," he said, " was virtually devoid of references to Hollerith technology."

Black's book, which has been translated into 11 languages and released in 60 countries, is a best-seller, with 100,000 copies having been sold to date. A second edition, containing new material, is scheduled to be published in 2002.

Also available in CD-ROM format, IBM and the Holocaust builds a compelling case that IBM, with corporate headquarters in New York City, supplied the frightening machinery that enabled Adolf Hitler to isolate and kill Jews in Germany and the rest of Europe.

"In general, this technology was crucial to the Holocaust as we know it," explained Black in an interview during a promotional tour here. It enabled the Nazis to accelerate and intensify the Holocaust, an unprecedented industrial killing process.

He cited two telling examples.

In France, where the Hollerith machine was not in play, about 24 percent of its Jewish population was murdered. But in Holland, where Hollerith technology was well entrenched, the Jewish death toll in percentage terms was considerably higher.

Black does not claim that Hollerith machines, named after their German inventor Herman Hollerith, in and of themselves tipped the balance in Hitler's obsessive rampage against Jews. However, this sophisticated punch card and card-sorting system, a precursor to the computer, made possible the idea of quickly amassing great quantities of information. With this data in hand, the Nazis were able to identify, round up and exterminate European Jews.

Hollerith, who was born in 1860 and died in 1929, immigrated to the United States when he was a teenager. With a magical ability to identify and quantify, he invented a technique to count people. His automated counting machine, initially deployed for the 1890 U.S. census, was a tabulating sensation.

After Hitler's accession to power, the Nazis asked the German Hollerith Machine Corporation, or Dehomag, an IMB subsidiary, to devise an efficient census package to count and classify citizens according to racial criteria.

"Only after Jews were identified could they be targeted for asset confiscation, ghettoization, deportation and ultimately extermination," Black writes.

Hollerith machines were not sold, but leased, maintained and upgraded by IBM, whose legendary president, Thomas Watson, was awarded a medal by the Nazis in 1937.

As Black recounts in his methodically researched book, nearly every Nazi concentration camp possessed a Hollerith department. "Without IBM's machinery, continuing upkeep and service, as well as the supply of punch cards, Hitler's camps could have never managed the numbers they did."

Hollerith technology was especially effective in keeping track of slave labourers. Black recounts an incident in which Auschwitz camp commandant Rudolf Hoess was rebuked for having to failed to account for 21,500 Jews. And he points out that Polish railway companies that transported Jews to their deaths had access to Hollerith technology.

Having proved that Hollerith technology was extremely helpful to the Nazis, Black stops short of accusing IBM of actual complicity in their crimes.

As he puts it: "No one will ever know exactly how many IBM machines clattered in which ghetto zone, train depot, or concentration camp. Nor will anyone prove exactly what IBM officials in Europe – or New York – understood about their location or use."

IBM's official logo

Even after the United States prohibited American firms from conducting transactions with their subsidiaries in Nazi-controlled countries, IBM was still able to monitor events and exercise authority through branch offices in neutral nations, Black observes.

"IBM's business," he notes, "was never about Nazism. It was never about anti-Semitism. It was always about the money."

During the course of his investigation, Black gathered 20,000 pages of documentation, enough for several books. He and his assistants scanned books, technical and scientific journals, Nazi publications and newspapers.

"I received extraordinary cooperation from every private, public and governmnental source in every country. Sadly, the only refusal came from IBM itself, which rebuffed my requests for documents and interviews."

IBM's chief archivist agreed to let him review documents at its corporate archives in Somers, New York. But he did not set a date.

As a result, Black was kept waiting indefinitely. "Days turned into weeks and weeks into months. IBM was stonewalling."

When historians Sybil Milton and Robert Wolfe wrote letters to IBM on Black's behalf, it transferred six boxes of documents to the custodianship of Dead Sea Scrolls scholar Lawrence Schiffman, affiliated with the department of Hebrew and Judaic Studies at New York University. Black read the documents, making good use of them.

Edwin Black

Unbeknownst to IBM in New York, Black eventually received permission from IBM Germany to study its archive. "When I flew to Stuttgart for my appointment, IBM barred my entry," he said.

Last summer, just weeks before the publication of IBM and the Holocaust, IBM reportedly delivered thousands of pages of German subsidiary documents and newsletters to Hohenheim University in Stuttgart. These documents, yet to be inventoried, remain closed to public scrutinty.

Black believes that IBM is getting poor advice from its public relations personnel. IBM, he said, owes the world three things: an apology, an admission of its usefulness to the Nazis and a reversal of its closed-door archival policy.

"IBM has yet to open its archives in Somers. Nor has it opened its repositories in Europe and Latin America. Thousands of IBM documents on the period are hidden from view. The history lurking in its archives is invaluable."

He is not sanguine that IBM will relent. "IBM has a proven track record of document destruction and a policy of moving around documents to keep them out of public view," he charged.

Accusing IBM of sowing confusion among reporters and historians, Black said that its objective is obfuscation.

"What IBM wants, most of all, is a lack of clarity, because, if the facts are disclosed, IBM can't win."

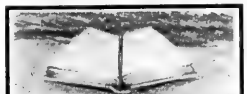
Jewish Life

What was Pharaoh's daughter thinking?

By RABBI BARRY GELMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

What was Pharaoh's daughter thinking when she decided to save the infant Moses, whom she discovered floating in the Nile River? The Torah tells us that she knew the child was Jewish. If so, how could she blatantly disregard the direct order of her father Pharaoh? And how is it that the royal court (perhaps including Pharoah himself) allowed Moses to live?

The commentators point to a number of textual hints that shed light on these questions. As soon as Moses is born, the Torah says, "She [Yocheved, Moses' mother] saw that he was good and she hid him for three days (Ex. 2:2)." Some commentators define "good" as beautiful or fair. Perhaps, then, the daughter of Pharoh was taken by Moses' beauty (cuteness?) and had pity on him.

This idea is consistent with the Egyptian focus on beauty. We know that when Abraham and Sarah travelled to Egypt that Abraham was afraid Sara would be taken, precisely because she was beautiful. There was such an obsession with beauty in Egypt that the daughter of Pharoah was willing to disregard her father's order to throw every Jewish male child into the Nile. This also explains why the royal court and perhaps even Pharoah himself allowed Moses to live. Despite their hatred for the Jews, they were willing to let one live in order to have his beautiful face grace the palace.

Sforno (Rav Ovadiah ben Yaakov Sforno, Italy, 1470 – 1550) offers a suggestion based on the following verse (Exodus 2: 7). "She [Pharoah's daughter] opened it [the basket] and saw him, the child, and behold a youth was crying. She took pity on him and said, 'This is one of the Hebrew boys.'"

At least two questions arise from this verse. The first question is, was Moses a child (infant) or a youth (young boy)? The second question is, why did she have to declare that he was a Jewish child?

In answering the first question, Sforno suggests that while Moses did in fact look like an infant, he sounded and acted like a young boy "far more advanced than any child his age." This "supernatural" development certainly fascinated the daughter of Pharoah, perhaps leading to her decision to keep him.

The answer to the second question helps us understand how the others allowed her to do this. According to Sforno, her declaration – "this is one of the Hebrew children" – was more than a simple statement of the child's DNA – it was her way of convincing the royal court to let her keep him.

The midrash teaches us that Pharoah's astrologers saw that a Jewish child who would lead his people out of Egyptian bondage would be born. It was that "prophecy" that motivated Pharoah to have all the male children killed.

Sforno puts the following words into the mouth of Pharaoh's daughter: "This cannot be a foundling born illegitimately who would be prepared to betray his benefactor, as it is said, 'Children of transgression, seed of falsehood'" (Isaiah 57:4). This was her way of convincing the court that this child would not "betray" his benefactor by leading his people out of Egypt.

These two approaches point to some profound lessons. While one would hope for proper motivation in doing a mitzvah, its absence does not negate the value of the act. While it certainly would have been better had the daughter of Pharoah saved Moses out of concern for a fellow human being, her improperly motivated act saved Moses and ultimately led to the salvation of B'nai Yisrael.

Secondly, we learn that one cannot buy loyalty. Although the royal court did care for baby Moses, ultimately their actions were wrong and even Moses, who perhaps did not have complete objectivity, seemed to recognize that.

Like Everyone Else... But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews*, by Morton Weinfeld, McClelland & Stewart, 2001

Books
Bernard Reskin

The author of this absorbing, informative, and often entertaining sociological study is sure that "Jewish life in Canada today is as good as it has been anywhere since the Golden Age of Spain."

Is that an extravagantly optimistic opinion? No, declares Morton Weinfeld, because Jews have stumbled onto "a magical equilibrium." They live in an atmosphere of relative security and fulfill the twin promises of Canadian multiculturalism. They maintain their own vibrant culture and participate fully in all aspects of Canadian life.

How this balance is maintained and how it operates is Weinfeld's major concern. This wide-ranging work observes and evaluates Canadian Jews from many points of view: How they earn a living, where they live, their relationship with non-Jews, their encounters with anti-Semitism, the nature of marriage and family relations, religious denominations and differences, varieties of Jewish culture, how children are educated, they multiplicity of community organizations, attitude toward Israel, etc.

For the author, "Every part of the story is revealing; together they help us understand the enigma of Jewish survival."

In recent years, attitudes toward intermarriage have undergone a profound change. For the most part the stigma is gone. Committed Jews know that despite their strong convictions, it can happen to their children too. In the United States, the attitudes toward intermarriage have become increasingly liberal. Canada remains far more traditional. "If told that their child was considering marrying a non-Jew, almost 60 pr cent of Montreal Jews would oppose the marriage, and only nine percent would openly support it. If the non-Jewish spouse converted to Judaism, the proportion that would actively oppose the marriage declines dramatically to 16 per cent. But this initial opposition to intermarriage is not unique to Montreal. A Toronto survey found similarly that fully two-thirds of third-generation Canadian Jews were strongly opposed to intermarriage, far more than other groups."

Jews are far more likely, at 67 per cent, to belong to religious congregations than are Christians, but they are less likely to attend weekly services (about 10 to 15 per cent to 23 percent, respectively). So are Jews hypocrites? Not really. Being an official member of a congregation clearly has more symbolic and communal meaning for Jews. "Judaism, unlike Christianity, is expressed religiously in many ways other than weekly attendance at services, mainly through major annual holidays and life-cycle rituals."

The author reminds us that Canada, with over 350,000 Jews, has the sixth-largest Jewish population in the world after the United States at 5.6 million, Israel at 4.3 million, France at 700,000, Russia at 550,000 and Ukraine at 400,000, and that Canada ranks ahead of the United Kingdom at 300,000 and Argentina at 220,000.

Do Jewish students today perform as well as those of a former generation? The answer seems to be no. Affluence and conformity have dulled the Jewish academic edge, as Asians, foreign or Canadian-born, take their place.

The happy conclusion of this many-layered study is that, despite numerous pressures, the fate of Canadian Jewry is secure. Unusual in a serious study of this kind is the author's willingness to express his personal opinion and feelings on the subjects discussed, as are his use of anecdotes and humour and his lucid writing, uncluttered by jargon or argot.

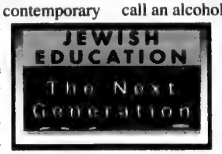
This is a splendid book, an enduring contribution on how to understand and view ourselves. It tells us where we are as Canadian Jews and what makes us

Jewish Life

Relativism, Torah and truth

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Have we betrayed a generation of students into thinking that Judaism is merely a set of "life prescriptions" and historical narratives, and that its goal is meaning as opposed to truth? Is there not a price to pay for the contemporary attempt to convert the Torah into a "personal growth" system or a means of conveying identity?



There are many Jewish educators and administrators who, ironically, seem to feel an odd chagrin at the notion of turning kids onto religion, much preferring to let their charges develop a sense of "Jewish pride." Henry James once referred to the novels of George Eliot as loose "baggy monsters" and the amorphous term "Jewish pride" is just such a beast. (Identity is hip, but let's not overdo it and actually make kids passionate about seriously practicing religion).

Education is not a neutral term. It derives from the Latin "educare," literally "to lead them out." To educate is one of the most active verbs we have in life's arsenal. The implication of the word is clear: ignorance is darkness, and knowledge can be light. But it is illuminating only when it leads to life change, not when it remains as static information. Or as Rabbi Abraham Twerski once asked in another context: What do you call an alcoholic in therapy who has no impetus to change? A self-aware drunk.

What has occurred in the wake of Sept. 11 is that all claims to truth are now tidily ensconced within the term fundamentalism. Although such critics are careful to delineate between fundamentalist violence and those who simply cling to what they see as absolutely true, the distinction quickly collapses and the real agenda emerges. All those who feel they possess a truth are suspect and, indeed, just a little dangerous, as though under the ideological rock of every right-wing minister or rabbi, Bin Laden waits to emerge.

Allan Bloom has sarcastically rehearsed this relativist dogma that permeates every corner of our culture, including Jewish education: "The true believer is the real danger... men always thought they were right, and that led to wars, persecutions, slavery, xenophobia, racism, and chauvinism. The point is not to correct the mistakes and really be right; rather it is not to think you are right at all."

For thousands of years, the Torah did not think of itself as "meaningful" or "relevant." It saw itself as God's word, as the truth of reality encoded in language. For Jews, the Torah was as axiomatic as 2+2=4. But in modernity, where the Torah is not a document of truth but of history and self-help, the math has changed.

So, a cautionary tale: Last year a mother told me of her teenage son who had been raised in their warm and "educated" Jewish family. They were not very ritually observant, nor did the notion of Torah as truth really play any part in the household ethos. But he had gone to day school and the family had kept a form of the High Holy Days, Chanukah, Seder and kashrut at home.

One summer, he went out of town and met Kristin, and the equations of his Jewish background – that in 21st-century Judaism, 2+2 can now equal six – failed to be a match for the love of a gentile woman. Because "six" just didn't add up when Kristin held his hand. Now, he's "going to the chapel, gonna get intermarried. Going to the chapel of love."

Summer camp nostalgia

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"Hello Muddah, hello Fadduh,/ Here I am at Camp Granada./ Camp is very entertaining,/ And they say we'll have some fun if it stops raining." [http://terris funnypages.com/terra/camp.html]

Whether you went to Camp Massad, Camp Ramah, Camp Moshava... or Allan Sherman's fabled "Camp Granada," nothing can compare to those long summer days and bug-filled nights at summer camp. Next week, we'll look at choices for modern-day campers. But first, a nostalgic look at summer camp on the World Wide Web.

Dina Fuchs owes a lot to her summer camp. Her existence. Dina's parents met at a Jewish camp. And Dina continued her family's connection to the camp when she packed up at the tender age of seven. But or Dina, things didn't start off too well. "To me, camp was like a Jewish juvenile detention center." Eventually, things changed and now she looks back fondly at those years. "My camp memories still sneak up on me once in awhile. One day, I was walking to my car after a rain storm and I caught a whiff of that sweet grass-soaked fragrance that lingers after a summer downpour. And in that instant, I was carried back to those sleepy mornings where I stood shivering in the dewy field at Camp Judaea – standing with my hands folded behind me, singing Hatikvah.'" [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk000512/supcampbug.shtml]

"Now I don't want this should scare ya,/ But my bunk mate has malaria./ You remember Jeffrey Hardy./ They're about to organize a searching party."

If you ever spent a summer at camp and want to relive those joys (and traumas), don't miss The Girls of Summer by Geraldine Sherman. She was a camper at Camp Kawagama in northern Ontario in the 1950s. Her story begins as she and her childhood friends attend the funeral of their beloved camp director. With the help of the girls of cabin 22, she looks at how a camp almost half a century ago moulded who they are today.

"If Margaret Mead had landed on Kawagama Island in 1955 instead of Samoa in 1925, what conclusions would she have drawn about North American adolescents? Would she have determined that camping was a rigorous and painful preparation for adulthood? A benign rite of passage? A privilege for society's future leaders? She would likely have decided, correctly, that camp was the place where our outrageous individualism was tempered in the fires of peer pressure, where the people we were to become first emerged." Even the picture of Sherman and the girls in plaid shirts and broad grins will bring smiles and a touch of melancholy to anyone who's been there and done that [http://www.geraldinesherman.com/Cabin22.html].

"Take me home, oh Muddah, Fadduh,/ Take me home, I hate Granada,/ Don't leave me out here in the forest, where/ I might get eaten by a bear."

No look back at summer camp would be complete without mentioning the food and drink. In fact, what defines Phyllis Wilson's Jewish summer camp years was the juice – bug juice. In reconstituting those memories, Wilson presents her recipe for Summer Camp Bug Juice. It calls for flavoured drink mix, sugar and "red food coloring if you feel a little sadistic," but no bugs. "Serve over ice if you want it cold. Serve with fleishig sandwiches, either on a picnic table under a shelter (day camp) or at long wooden tables with benches in a room with a screen door leading to a flag circle (overnight camp.)" [http://www.jewishfood-list.com/recipes/beverages/bugjuice01.html]

For Rebecca Ets-Hokin, memories of summer camp include not-so-delicious camp meals. [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk990423/cook.shtml]. "My dining hall memories include rubbery scrambled eggs, warm Kool-Aid and unappetizing stews." But all that changed when she revisited her childhood camp to find that it has a new motto: Camp Tawonga, where food is king! "The powdered government-surplus eggs and milk, and the canned fruits and vegetables of the 1970s have been replaced with farm-fresh produce and California Culinary Academy graduates in the kitchen, with one cook devoted solely to vegetarian cuisine." Ets-Hokin collected recipes of some of the campers' favourites and has adapted the recipes to feed eight.

"Wait a minute, it stopped hailing./ Guys are swimming, guys are sailing./ Playing baseball, gee that's better./ Muddah, Fadduh, kindly disregard this letter!"

credit with virtually no strings attached, except for some minor restrictions, such as criminal background checks for teachers and staff and a minimum number of instruction hours. He also said schools must offer at least 75 percent of their services in Ontario and must provide information to parents on academic programs and teachers' credentials.

He did not mention curriculum standards or qualification requirements for teachers. Over the past few weeks, Flaherty has said that existing anti-hate laws already restrict schools from teaching certain points of view.

"I think parents, when fully informed, are better at choosing a school for their child than the government," he said.

Eves, on the other hand, said that public financing of private education without controls over curriculum is "ludicrous" and may wind up supporting extremist schools that preach hate.

"I'm not against choice in the education system, but I am in favour of some very basic standards," said Eves, a former provincial finance minister. "Are you in favour of a school that doesn't teach any basic curriculum and teaches hatred?"

That remark landed Eves in hot water with the Catholic Civil Rights League, which accused him of being "anti-religious."

Eves also called for "basic standards" for schools and said that if he became premier, he'd require private schools to teach "core subjects the public has a right to expect," including reading, writing and arithmetic.

Flaherty, speaking to the OAJDS, said, "I trust parents. Our government trusts parents. It is a shame that others don't trust parents more. Parents choose the school, not the government."

He quoted from the brief the Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF) presented last summer to the legislative committee that studied the tax credit: "It's all about freedom; freedom for parents to direct the education of their children in their faith, culture and tradition; freedom from the threat of extinction in the face of an overwhelmingly secular society. It's about opening the tent of public funding to accommodate real diversity, the kind of diversity that exists in Ontario today."

Flaherty said he completely agrees with those sentiments, adding, "I pledge my continuing support for the Equity in Education Tax Credit and for the regulations."

He said there is "substantial support" for the measure in the public school sector and within the Catholic separate system.

Flaherty told The CJN he's surprised this has become an issue in the race to replace Harris.

"This is government policy. The regulations have been passed and it's now law," he said.

The tax credit has provided the first sparks in the Tory leadership race. Last month, another candidate, Environment Minister Elizabeth Witmer, sided with Eves, saying schools should meet Ontario curriculum standards before parents can qualify for the credit.

Witmer and Attorney General David Young, who said Eves' ideas "merit further consideration," rejected suggestions they were publicly disagreeing with cabinet.

But some Jewish officials say it's too early to worry about Eves' stand.

Asked what Canadian Jewish Congress's interpretation of Eves' statements are, Simon Rosenblum, CJC's point man on the file, said "We don't know yet. It's unclear if he's saying he wants control over curriculum or if he wants more guarantees that basic subjects will be taught."

Either way, most Jewish day schools and all the high schools already conform to, and probably exceed, provincial standards on curriculum and core subjects, Rosenblum said.

Yisroel Janowski, who announced at the Dec. 19 meeting that he is stepping down as the first president of the OAJDS, with a successor to be named soon, played down any potential split between Orthodox and non-Orthodox schools if it comes to relinquishing more control to the government. "We have not confronted that issue," he said. "It has not come up.

"The reason the OAJDS is successful is because we're united," Janowski said, referring to the fact that the organization brings together all schools from across the religious spectrum.

Rosenblum said he would be "very surprised" if the OAJDS did not meet with Eves prior to the leadership vote in March.

Info on tax credit released

TORONTO — Included in the 2001 Ontario Budget is an Equity in Education Tax Credit which will be phased in over a period of five years.

The Ministry of Finance has released a bulletin with a general outline explaining how the credit will work.

Beginning in 2002, the credit will reimburse 10 percent of tuition costs paid by parents or legal guardians up to a maximum of $700 for a child older than six years at the end of the taxation year and $350 for a child less than six but older than four.

The credit will increase by 10 percent each year until the maximum of 50 percent of the tuition, or $3,500, is reached by 2006.

Parents who send their children to an eligible independent school located in Ontario qualify for the credit. Eligible schools are those that are not public or separate schools currently administered under the Education Act.

Some of the highlights of the tax credit are:

- if you owe tax when you file your return, the tax credit will reduce the amount you have to pay;
- if you do not owe any tax when you file your return, the tax credit will be added to the refund you receive;
- the school must have at least five eligible pupils enrolled throughout the school year;
- the school is required to have carried out criminal reference checks by Jan. 1, 2003 on all current staff and other individuals associated with the school who are in regular contact with pupils;
- the school will be required to disclose a statement of information by the end of February of each year;
- there is no family limit on the amount of credit available, only an annual limit on the eligible amount for each child;
- the tax credit is based on the amount determined to be "net tuition fees";
- scholarships, bursaries or other subsidies must be deducted from the cost of tuition when calculating net tuition;
- where a charitable donations tax receipt relating to religious instruction is given by the school, the net tuition fee must be reduced to take into account the portion of the tuition fees available for the charitable dontation;
- the tax credit is based on tuition fees for a taxation year, which is generally the calendar year, not the usual September to June school year.

At the time of this writing, the detailed regulations were not yet published. For further information, visit www.gov.on.ca/fin/english/taxbeng.htm.

1. אבו מאזן, מנהו של ערפאת, כתב ב 76' את חדברים חבאים בבטאון אש"ף "צבאות ערב, שפלשו לארץ ב 48', אילצו את חפלסטינים לחגר ולעזוב את מולדתם וכפו עליהם מצור פוליטי ואידיאולוגי".

2. חאלד עואס, ראש ממשלת סוריה ב 48'-49' כתב ביומרנותו שפורסמו ב 73': " מאז 48' אנו דורשים את חחזרת חפלסטינים לבתיהם, אבל אנו עצמנו חיינו אלה שעודדו אותם לעזוב".

3. טוביו גרייס, חוקר פלסטיני במרכז למחקרים פלסטינים בבירות כתב ב 75': "עניין הפליטים ייחודים מארצות ערב, שחשאירו שם את רכושם, מאזן למעשה את בעיית הפליטים חערבים".

"עם שמוא וכלום מיוחם עניש לחכת פלי לחמוא.
עם פאומת אך לא תוכל לחמוא.
שום דבר פועיל: הכל הפוכו פאלמות.
פלש אפתועם פאלמות פל פועת צוק לאמת".

Jews need to emphasize accomplishments: Wisse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The worst way to tell the story of the Jews is through the Holocaust, says Harvard University Prof. Ruth Wisse.

Rather than getting the world to pay attention to the triumph of anti-Semitism, we should get them to pay attention to what we have accomplished despite the Holocaust, she said.

Ruth Wisse

Wisse, from Montreal, is an author and the Martin Peretz Professor of Yiddish and Comparative Literature at Harvard. She was here recently to speak at the third and concluding lecture of the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series at Holy Blossom Temple.

In an interview before the lecture, she said it is extremely important that people know our history, "but the Holocaust is not the high point of Jewish history.

"If we are asking, for example, Canadian students to know about the Jews, then we should insist upon them knowing about the establishment of the state of Israel," she said.

The Holocaust was the greatest trauma of the Jewish people, "and it is crucial that we know it and mourn it and face it, but that is not the way one should tell the Jewish story. The Jewish story should be about how we have overcome our destruction."

In the story of Exodus, Jews include an account of their slavery, she said, but they tell of that slavery in order to tell of their freedom.

What we have done, she said, is highlight victimhood instead of victory. "We have tried to turn ourselves into an oppressed people in the hope of teaching others lessons in goodness."

Our first task, she said, is to stop representing Jews as a sacrifice and begin telling the story of Jewish dedication to rebuilding and to freedom.

"Every Holocaust program should be revised to become an education of what Jews have accomplished. We want the respect of our children, not the hand-wringing.

"We want the respect of the world, not its morbid fascination," she said.

To be part of a people, she said, means to learn your political history, but in schools today, "there is very little account taken of the fact that we are now a politically constituted people with a country of own own.

"One of the things that every Jewish person should be in possession of is the political history of the Jewish people. We have to know, not just the Bible, but we have to understand the course of Jewish history and we have to understand ourselves as a political people."

Clearly, she said, in such a political history, what has happened in the last 100 years would be of primary importance.

"The greatest importance is the decision of the Jews to claim their sovereignty in the land of Israel.

"If one emphasized that, one would see what a remarkable achievement it was to be able to reconstitute Jewish sovereignty in Israel."

We have to take responsibility for our homeland, she said. "We have to use all our creativity, energy and imagination, and all the power we can muster to ensure that the Arab world accepts what it should have accepted in 1948.

"[The Arab world] has to realize that we are not the defendant in the court of public opinion, we are the plaintiff. We have to demand what is our due. The unequivocal recognition of Israel and the respect of Israel and the Jewish people is our due," Wisse said before her speech.

History will ask only one question of the Jews of our generation, Wisse told the capacity crowd, and that is whether or not they secured the state of Israel.

Twice before, the Jewish people have lost their political sovereignty – to the Babylonians and to the Romans – "and as we say in America, three strikes and you're out," she told the audience.

"No one is given an infinite number of chances to get things right, and thanks to the early Zionists, Jews now have their third chance to hold on to their ancestral land. History expects us to learn from our mistakes."

Securing Israel, she said, is inseparable from securing democracy as a whole. "Whether we like it or not, what happens to the Jews is an indicator of what is going to happen to the rest of the democratic world."

If we want to change the attitude of our enemies, she said, it is not enough to raise our fists and say never again. "We have to maintain our moral self-confidence... and we have to recognize first and foremost that the creation of the State of Israel is the greatest national achievement of the 20th century."

THE TORONTO JEWISH HEALING PROJECT

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

"Al Tifrosh Min Hatzibur-
Do not separate yourself from the community."
is never more important than at a time of illness.

Jewish tradition recognizes that, though there is never less to healing than what medical science is capable of, there is more to "healing" than what medicine offers.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is not affiliated with any stream of Judaism. It focuses on addressing human needs through the lens that Judaism can offer.

Longtime volunteer goes professional at Bar-IlanUniversity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dov Altman, new executive director of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, freely admits that until recently he had had no clue what went on at the Ramat Gan-based campus.

A longtime, high-level volunteer in the Jewish community, Altman, 42, figured if he didn't know about Bar-Ilan, chances were good a lot of other people were equally uninformed.

In addition to focusing on fund-raising, he wants to raise awareness and build the profile of Bar-Ilan in Canada. The organization has offices in Toronto and Montreal, but its mandate is national, said Altman.

The university, which has 30,000 students and a wide range of programs including law and business, is the only one in Israel where all students are required to take Jewish studies.

Although it is commonly perceived as an "Orthodox" institution, Altman said 50 percent of the students are secular. In fact, he noted, there is a higher percentage of Arab women at the institution than at any other Israeli university.

The university "encourages dialogue and learning together between secular and Orthodox."

The largely modern Orthodox base of Bar-Ilan supporters here is not as diverse as the university's student body, however, admits Altman, who took on his new role Nov. 19. "That's one of the tasks at hand right now – to broaden that base."

Although his professional experience is in commercial leasing – he spent the past four years as leasing director at O & Y Enterprise Commercial Management – Altman's background as a volunteer is focused mainly on fund-raising.

He became involved in that field – indirectly – through the involvement of his wife, lawyer Elana Fleischmann, on a federation subcommittee a number of years ago.

Most recently, he was chair of canvasser training and motivation for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2002 campaign. He has also trained more than 500 canvassers for solicitation of major gifts.

Dov Altman

Altman used to look forward to his evening volunteer work when he was working at his day job, he recalls. Many people have been rethinking their lives since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, he noted, and those events may have been a catalyst for his decision to change course.

During the High Holy Day period he made up his mind to look for work in the Jewish community where he could "feel fulfilled, and [feel] that I was making a difference to the community and the lives of Jews. No one was really surprised. People were surprised I didn't do it before."

His work for UJA Federation and Bar-Ilan stems from his strong Jewish identity and love for Israel, which he first visited in 1978. "I really believe that strong institutions in Israel will make the country strong."

He became involved in community leadership as a member of B'nai Brith Youth Organization, when he was a student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute. Within a year of joining at age 15, the Toronto native became chapter president. He then served as president of his region, and of his district.

More recently, he has served on the boards of Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

"I don't enjoy being an observer or a participant. I like to be part of the team that's leading," said Altman. "I grew up in a family of organizers."

His mother, Jean, was a chapter president of B'nai Brith Women (now Jewish Women International) and their home was often the hub of events for extended family.

Altman's late father, Joseph (a co-owner of Sunnybrook Foods, where Dov worked in the kosher meat department while in school), taught him "a deep respect for other people...He didn't like to see anyone go without."

Altman would like to impart to his own children, a 9-year-old son and 5-year-old daughter, the importance of his work in the Jewish community and makes a point of bringing them along when appropriate. "They're very at home in the Lipa Green building," he said.

The adjacent Leah Posluns Theatre will be the location for the next major Canadian Friends event, a Sunday evening BESA (Begin-Sadat) Centre conference featuring MP Irwin Cotler and Bar-Ilan professors from the university's Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies, to be held Jan. 27.

"I think the community's going to be hearing a lot more about Bar-Ilan," said Altman.

Finestone to retire from the Senate in January

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sheila Finestone's 18-year political career will end Jan. 28 when she reaches the Senate's mandatory retirement age of 75.

In her farewell address to her colleagues, Finestone was her usual outspoken self, summing up her years in the House of Commons and the upper chamber thus:

"I fought my own battles based on my convictions and never exempted myself from the spirit of hope, liberty and justice." She quoted a friend as saying she has "an uncanny knack of always calling a spade a spade."

Finestone, who described herself as "a mother, a politician, a Canadian, a Québécoise and a Jewish woman," spoke first of her "ancestral land," Israel and her hope that the current conflict can be resolved through dialogue.

In an interview, Finestone said she has regarded bringing the concerns of the Jewish community, including ensuring fair representation of Israel's cause, as fundamental to her role as a parliamentarian – in caucus, in government, and internationally.

"I have a strong sense of Jewish responsibility and the need to ensure respect and fair play for Israel. I believe I have been effective," said Finestone, one of six Jewish senators.

In her farewell, she paid tribute to her parents, the late Minnie and Monroe Abbey, community leaders who taught her the values tolerance and compassion. Before entering politics in 1984, as the Liberal MP for Mount Royal, Finestone had distinguished herself as a volunteer and social activist both within the Jewish community and beyond.

Finestone said in an interview that back in 1984 she never would have believed she would stay in Ottawa for 18 years. Although Mount Royal is one of the safest Liberal seats in the country, getting the party's nomination was a tough battle. Her main opponent, William Dery, a Sephardi leader, put up a good fight and the riding's nomination convention was the largest in the party's history, she said.

The 1984 election was also no cakewalk against Conservative Sharon Wolfe. Yet, in 1988 and '93, Finestone had the highest popular vote in Canada.

Finestone, appointed to the Senate in August,1999 during her fourth term as MP, said she entered federal politics because of the reforms made by her predecessor, Pierre Trudeau, who had represented the largely Jewish Mount Royal for 19 years.

"Mr. Trudeau, looking at me through those sharp blue piercing eyes, asked why I agreed to run for office; did I know what a terrible life it could be?

"I told him it was all his doing, his fault, because he had brought in multicultural rights and women's rights, under the umbrella of human rights, though the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

"It struck a profound chord with me. I sincerely believed that with this exciting new charter, a charter for democracy, real democracy, that Canada would be strengthened and thus become a better, more equitable and fairer country."

After sitting in opposition until Jean Chrétien's first election in 1993, Finestone was secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women until January, 1996.

More recently, Finestone has taken a keen interest in the campaign to eliminate land mines, serving as special adviser to Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley. In Cambodia and Mozambique, she even joined in land mine clearing operations.

Finestone cited two especially meaningful personal legislative projects. The first was an amendment to the Broadcasting Act that would allow individuals to have an equitable say in decisions regarding television and radio. The bill, passed by the Senate, was given third reading in the Commons in June.

But Finestone's pet project is her privacy rights charter, now awaiting third reading in the Commons. It would provide legal protection to individuals from such invasions of privacy as surveillance, interception of private communications and the disclosure of personal information.

"I believe privacy is a fundamental human right and, once lost, is unlikely to be regained," she said. "Without adequate protection of privacy, many other rights integral to a democratic society are also lost."

Finestone has been an active member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union (IPU) which brings together elected officials of 144 countries – including many that are not true democracies. (The group has not granted Israel full membership.) She serves as Canadian chair and is on its 12-member executive committee.

"That election was remarkable because I have taken my share of taunts for making representations for Israel. I've been called an Israeli agent and Mrs. Israel, but I'm proud to be acknowledged as a concerned member of the Jewish people."

During this parliamentary session, she was vice-chair of the new Senate human rights committee. She also participated in the the Senate's pre-study committee on terrorism, which recommended the inclusion of a sunset clause and parliamentary oversight in the anti-terrorism bill, recently passed into law.

Finestone said she hasn't "even thought about what I will do in retirement, but I have a number of offers." She says she is in good health and has a lot of energy, and won't be idle. One immediate project is to encourage another Jewish woman from Quebec to take her seat.

Before leaving at the end of January, she will be traveling to Oslo and Geneva for IPU meetings and to Israel for a Jewish parliamentarians' mission.

She will live in Ottawa because two of her four sons and four of her seven grandchildren live there. Two other sons are in Toronto and Chicago.

Popes championed anti-Semitism, author says

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Forcing Jews to wear yellow badges and locking them in ghettoes were not cruelties the Nazis invented in the 20th century, but rather practices popes "had championed for hundreds of years," says the author of a new book condemning the Vatican for its role in promulgating the hatred that led to the Holocaust.

According to David Kertzer – author of The Popes Against the Jews: The Vatican's Role in the Rise of Modern Anti-Semitism (Knopf) – the supreme leaders of the Roman Catholic Church "were significant players in developing modern notions of anti-semitism in the late 19th century," attitudes that led directly to the Nazi's Final Solution.

Visiting Toronto as part of a promotional tour which included a lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Kertzer spoke with The CJN and expanded on his findings after being allowed extended access to the Vatican's so-called Inquisition archives in 1998 and 1999.

Rather than focus exclusively on the deeds of Pius XII, who was pope during the Holocaust, Kertzer said he was more interested in papal history stretching back to 1814, shortly after Napoleon liberated Europe's Jews from their enclosed and restrictive domains.

"In 1814, with the restoration of the Old Regimes, including the Papal States, there was a major question that the rulers faced: Do we send the Jews back into the ghettoes, or do we leave them free to enjoy equal rights with other citizens?" Kertzer said.

"I discovered confidential correspondence of the Vatican's secretary of state from 1814-15, when he was arguing with the pope not to send the Jews back into the ghettoes of the papal states. The pope overruled him and sent them back with all the old restrictions, such as wearing the yellow Jewish badges and being locked in at night."

"I think that was a fateful transition," he said. "The whole history of the Jews and the Catholic church could have taken a much more positive direction if a different policy had been taken back in 1814."

We Remember, an important Vatican document released in 1998, pointed out that Jews were increasingly given civil rights throughout the 19th century, but failed to note that the Vatican itself repeatedly denounced the governments of Europe for emancipating the Jews, Kertzer said. In short, the document apparently whitewashes Vatican history, he said.

"Throughout the 19th century and into the 20th, the Vatican called for re-introducing the old restrictions on the rights of the Jews as the only way to protect European society."

Kertzer, a professor at Brown University in Providence, R.I., gained much knowledge of the Church's anti-semitism in the 19th century while researching his first book, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara, a riveting true story of a Jewish boy who was kidnapped from his family and raised as a Catholic with the pope's blessing.

In the Vatican archives Kertzer found a shocking indictment of Pius XI, who seemed to endorse the racial laws enacted in Italy about 1938. "The church hierarchy in Italy called on Italians to observe the anti-Semitic laws, saying they were fully in harmony with age-old church teachings on how to deal with the Jews," he said.

"Pope Pius XI was irate about one aspect of the racial laws, so irate that he complained to the king – in other words, he went over the head of Mussolini. But what he complained about was not any of the anti-Semitic laws, but the fact that according to the racial laws, a baptized Jew should still be considered a Jew and could not marry a Catholic. This angered the Pope because from the Vatican perspective, a baptized Jew should be regarded as Catholic."

Kertzer praised the current Pope, John Paul II, for working to improve Catholic-Jewish relations through visits to Auschwitz, Israel and the synagogue in Rome.

Kertzer said he is encouraged that, even though the Vatican has closed certain archives to Holocaust researchers, it had opened its "very sensitive" historical archives to other researchers with a broader perspective.

Glace Bay community leader remembered

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Obituary

TORONTO — Until he moved to Toronto 12 years ago, Philip Simon was the de facto spiritual leader of the small Jewish community in Glace Bay, N.S. He died of heart failure at York Central Hospital Dec. 16, at age 79.

A dentist by profession, Simon was born in Birch Grove, N.S., but his family moved to nearby Glace Bay when he was a young boy. The fourth of five children of immigrant parents, Israel and Dora, who owned a small grocery store, Simon was the first in his family to attend university.

He returned to Glace Bay after completing dental school at Dalhousie University, and married Ruth Tanner, a native of Ottawa, in 1953.

Simon's personal story is "reflective of the transition of life in a small Jewish community in Canada," said Victor Goldberg in a eulogy.

Goldberg, immediate past president of the Atlantic Jewish Council and Simon's nephew by marriage, spoke of the small but vibrant Jewish community in which Simon grew up and of Simon's efforts to maintain Jewish life there.

Well into middle age, Simon taught himself to read Torah when the community could no longer sustain a rabbi, said Goldberg. He served as president of Congregation Sons of Israel for 17 years. "I could never get over how Philip combined rabbinical services with dentistry," said Goldberg.

Outside the Jewish community, Simon was active in the local Rotary Club and the Police Boys' Club (an organization focused on helping youngsters follow a wholesome path). He also lobbied successfully for fluoridation of water in Glace Bay.

"He was well known and well liked," said Glace Bay native Ben Prossin, executive director, Ontario region of the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF), who also gave a eulogy. "He was always there as an inspiration. He was a nice guy with a wonderful sense of humour and a very high level of tolerance. He tried to understand people and their problems."

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, Simon chaired the board of education of the local Talmud Torah, which then had between 60 and 75 students, recalled Prossin. Simon also worked directly with the youngsters, organizing at least one play in which Prossin was involved, in 1956.

Simon was also active in the Atlantic Jewish Council, serving as a Glace Bay representative, and led State of Israel Bond and JNF drives, Prossin added.

More recently, in Toronto, Simon led weekly Friday afternoon services at the Baycrest Centre on a volunteer basis, read Torah at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, and was the driving force behind the creation of the Toronto-based Cape Breton Jewish Club.

In August he attended Glace Bay's "Kum-A-Haym," the 100th anniversary of Sons of Israel, where he received "a hero's welcome," said Goldberg. "One had to take turns to have a visit with him."

Community involvement notwithstanding, Simon was "there for the children always. He was truly a family person," his son Mark told The CJN.

Simon is survived by his wife Ruth, sons Gary of London, Ont., and Bruce and Mark, both of Toronto, and 12 grandchildren. He was predeceased by his son Allan and by his siblings Annie Bercy, Bess Medjuck, Nathan Simon and Ruth Hirsch.

Poll cites Arafat for violence results because of smaller sample sizes).

More than 45 per cent of Canadians who follow the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians say they do not support either side, the poll found.

Among those who are inclined to favour one side, the Israelis had almost twice as many supporters as the Palestinians – 21 percent vs. 11 percent.

Israel had the least support in the current conflict in Quebec, where only 14 percent backed the Jewish state.

However, Quebecers did not have much more sympathy for the Palestinians – 15 per cent said they support them, the highest in the country. Yet Quebecers also showed the greatest neutrality on the issue, with 55 percent saying they supported neither side.

Israel enjoys its strongest support in Manitoba/Saskatchewan where 29 percent said they sided with the Jewish state, compared to only 8 per cent with the Palestinians.

In English Canada, support for Israel was weakest in Ontario (20 percent), although still well ahead of the Palestinians who found only 11 percent support in the province.

The largest disparity in views shows up when respondents are categorized by mother tongue. Those whose first language is neither English nor French showed the greatest sympathy for the Palestinians at 20 percent, compared to 13 percent among francophones and 9 percent among anglophones.

Supporters of Israel included 24 percent of anglophones, 21 percent of allophones and 13 percent of francophones.

Léger found that close to eight out of 10 Canadians follow news of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with 35 percent saying they do so regularly and 42 percent saying occasionally. One in five were not interested at all in the issue.

Interest is highest among those over 45, with an annual income greater than $60,000, or working in the professions.

A majority (52 percent) wish to see the United Nations intervene militarily to resolve the conflict. Support for such action was highest among those aged 18-24. Regionally, UN intervention had the least support in Quebec and most on the Prairies.

A larger majority (64 percent) of Canadians do not think Palestinians and Israelis will be living in peace within the next five years. The most pessimistic on the chances of resolving the conflict soon are those in higher-income brackets (75 percent) and those with university educations (71 percent).

Amid despair, history gives hope: Troy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Gil Troy, a Harvard-trained McGill University professor, is an expert in U.S. history, particularly the American presidency.

He has published three books on the subject since 1991, his latest being Mr. and Mrs. President: From the Trumans to the Clintons (University Press of Kansas, 2000).

But now, in a major departure from his usual academic pursuits, Troy has written a speculative rather than a scholarly work.

He regards Why I Am a Zionist: Israel, Jewish Identity and the Challenges of Today, which was published in Montreal last month by the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, as an "act of activism" rather than a feat of scholarship.

"I view it as the start of a conversation that needs to be occurring among North American Jews about Israel and Zionism," he explained.

Troy, a staunch Zionist, plans to donate his royalties to the families of Israeli soldiers missing in action.

"Regardless of the current status of the hostages, the families need our support, financial, political, emotional."

The publisher's profits, he added, will be funnelled to the Birthright Israel program, which has sent thousands of young Jews to Israel on educational trips.

"These two causes represent the two sides of the Zionist coin these days – the demand to react to crisis, and the continuing need to be proactive and embrace positive associations and experiences, so we don't just bog down in fights."

Judging from the blurbs on its cover, Why I Am a Zionist has struck a chord.

"Not in decades has there been a more persuasive presentation of the case," Martin Peretz, editor-in-chief of The New Republic, observed. Rabbi Irving Greenberg, president of the Jewish Life Network, called it "an inspiring Zionist manifesto for our time."

No one who knows Troy will be surprised by his commitment to Zionism.

Gil Troy

Born in Queens, N.Y., in 1961, he and his two brothers grew up in a traditional Conservative Jewish home. (Dan, his older brother, is chief counsel for the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, while Tevi, his younger brother, is deputy assistant secretary for the U.S. Department of Labour).

Troy's mother, Elaine, a guidance counsellor and therapist, participated in the very first Habonim-year-in-Israel trip.

His father, Bernard Dov, a social science teacher and Jewish educator, administered a Hebrew high school and was executive director of the Jewish Educators Assembly in New York. As well, he served as national president of Betar.

So Troy, a graduate of the Solomon Schechter School, also gravitated to Zionism.

"I was very involved in high school, college and graduate school with Young Judea, the largest Zionist youth movement. It had a huge impact on my Jewish – and human – identity."

He likens his 10 years at Harvard, where he earned his degrees in American history, to a dream.

"It was intellectually stimulating, emotionally enriching and absolutely life-transforming," he said. "Great professors, great people, great libraries and a great place to live and learn."

In part, his interest in the field was a function of old-fashioned patriotism.

"I'm an ardent American patriot who believes in the mission of the United States. Despite all too human imperfections, the United States is a nation dedicated to democracy and liberty, an extraordinary continent-wide experiment in mass democratic republican government, and an overwhelming success."

Yet Troy, a landed immigrant who has lived in Montreal for almost 12 years, brings a balanced approach to his discipline.

"I don't believe in studying the United States with rose-coloured glasses, but I also think one should be wary of being excessively critical."

Troy turned a PhD thesis into his first book, See How They Ran: The Changing Role of the Presidential Candidate (Harvard University Press).

Troy's second book, Affairs of State: The Rise and Rejection of the Presidential Couple (The Free Press) was inspired by two unrelated events in 1992: Bill and Hillary Clinton's joint campaign for a co-presidency, and his own engagement and marriage.

Troy's wife, Linda Adams, a former lawyer, is trying to establish a children's museum in Montreal. The Troys have three children.

Apart from his scholarly writings, Troy contributes a regular column on the U.S. domestic scene, called The Ivory Tower, to The Forward, and freelances for The Canadian Jewish News and the National Post, among other newspapers.

"I believe that scholars in general and historians in particular should be engaged in public debates," he said.

Troy, who headed the Birthright launch in Montreal, was originally skeptical of the program, and said so in a Moment magazine article. Now he is a true believer.

"It is an exciting and bold initiative that has been extraordinarily successful thus far, but cannot rest on its laurels. The secret is in systematic, creative follow-up."

He says his world was "shattered" by the eruption of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000. "I really believed we had turned a corner, that we had a shot at peace and prosperity in Israel. I now fear that [the uprising] is not about settlements, but about the existence of Israel itself."

Troy, however, remains sanguine.

"Amid my despair, history gives me hope," he said, citing the example of two former enemies, Japan and Germany, that transformed themselves after World War II.

Neither is he worried that Israel will be victimized by the United States as it battles Al Qaeda in Afghanistan.

"I'm dismayed that the United States – and Canada – have put undue pressure on Israel to reward Palestinian violence with more concessions. But at the end of the day, I believe that U.S.-Israel relations are fundamentally sound, and that in five years from now, if all goes well, Israel will be stronger because the terrorist network will be weakened, even if it is not destroyed."

Israel's Magen David Adom facing tough times

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These are tough times for Magen David Adom (MDA), the Israeli counterpart to the Red Cross.

In the last 16 months, 57 of its ambulances have been torched by Palestinian rioters, cutting into its ability to provide emergency first response services, just as incidents of suicide bombings have increased while day-to-day public health demands remain unabated.

On the international front, MDA continues its 52-year long effort to push for inclusion into the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, a move that would give the organization enhanced international legitimacy while facilitating the sharing of expertise and resources.

Political pressure from Arab and Muslim states along with the reluctance of the Federation's constituent organizations to include the red Shield of David as a recognized emblem have stymied MDA's efforts.

At a meeting last month of the Federation's General Assembly, delegates passed a resolution calling on the signatories to the Geneva Convention to amend the document's protocols to open the door to MDA's inclusion – though not necessarily by recognizing the red Shield of David.

Under the rules that govern the Federation, which provides disaster relief, and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which provides battlefield emergency services, signatory nations must first amend the convention before new symbols can be added.

Currently, the convention states specifically that the only emblems that can be used to protect the medical services of armed forces are the red cross and red crescent.

A solution has been proposed that would allow MDA to join the international bodies, but it is far from Israel's first choice. Proposals being seriously considered would provide for the addition of a third, neutral symbol, like a diamond or a pair of chevrons, in which the Magen David and other national symbols could be embedded.

MDA has stated repeatedly its preference would be for the red Shield of David to join the other symbols on an equal basis.

"Although Israel has reservations about this proposal, since it would inevitably single out Israel as one of the only countries not entitled to use the same symbol for both protective and indicative purposes, there is no doubt that it represents an improvement over the status quo," MDA's Web site states.

An international convocation of countries was scheduled to look into the matter in the fall of 2000, but that meeting was called off after the intifadah erupted.

Red Shield of David not a recognized emblem

Speaking to the General Assembly in November, Dr. Moshe Melloul, president of MDA, said "we were disappointed it was postponed for political reasons, in contradiction with the aim of achieving true universality."

Alan Spector, past president of the Toronto chapter of Canadian MDA, said MDA "has had problems with the ICRC since 1949" when the international body first blocked Israel's attempts to join. MDA meets all Federation and ICRC standards but controversy over the MDA emblem is the last outstanding issue, he said.

"Significant prejudice within that organization," is responsible, Spector suggested, adding "in the past six years, Arabs have pressured the ICRC to keep Israel out."

For its part, the American Red Cross has proven to be a persistent advocate for MDA, fighting for its inclusion for the last 20 years. It has withheld its dues to the Federation in the past two.

David McLaughlin, chair of the American Red Cross, told the General Assembly that "our board of governors has reaffirmed the American Red Cross policy to continue withholding [dues] payment until the MDA and Kazakh societies are accorded admission to the Federation."

The Canadian Red Cross supports MDA's inclusion in the Federation and ICRC, as long as it is done in conformity with international law and procedures, said Paul Wharram, deputy secretary general of the Canadian Red Cross.

"The Canadian Red Cross wants to see the full admission of the MDA into the Federation at the earliest possible moment through whatever legal means are acceptable to all," he said, adding the Red Cross supports creation of a third neutral emblem into which the Shield of David could be incorporated.

"We prefer this solution because in our view it is a universal solution that would help us deal with future issues of the same nature," he said.

In opposing the addition of the red Shield of David to the two currently in use, the ICRC and the Federation argue such a move would open the floodgates, leading other national organizations to demand the inclusion of their national symbols as well and undermine their protective effects.

"The danger of proliferation therefore cannot be ignored," said Francois Bugnion, the ICRC's director of international law and communication.

"In the ICRC's opinion, the adoption of a third protective emblem devoid of any political or religious significance and its recognition alongside the red cross and red crescent is the most realistic way of settling the matter of the emblem and of satisfying the aspirations of countries and national societies that can accept neither the red cross nor the red crescent."

While the political maneuvering continues, MDA has upped its level of participation in various Federation activities. MDA was given a seat in one of four commissions created at the General Assembly, and it is enjoying "expanded participation within the Federation and the General Assembly," Wharram said.

Meanwhile, on the domestic scene, Canadian Magen David Adom is fighting a decision by Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) to remove its charitable status. CCRA contends that MDA operates outside the Green Line, Israel's 1967 border, and so, cannot receive a charitable number. Spector believes it will be two or three years before tax courts render a final decision in the case.

New Labor head Ben-Eliezer faces tough odds

By PETER HIRSCHBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer took over last Thursday as leader of the Labor Party with a formidable constellation of political forces ranged against him – including some senior members of his own party – but with history on his side.

Ben-Eliezer adopts the leadership mantle bruised by an ugly, protracted battle with Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg over the results of a party primary held on Sept. 4. After months of wrangling over charges of voter fraud, the final primary result was determined when elections for party leader were held again in about 50 Arab polling stations. The final margin of Ben-Eliezer's victory: about 2,500 votes.

With the official results hardly out, Labor's leading dove, former justice minister Yossi Beilin, was already attacking Ben-Eliezer, calling him a clone of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and saying that while he was the "legal" leader of the party, he was not its "legitimate" head. Beilin, who backed Burg, added he hoped Ben-Eliezer would be a "temporary" leader.

But most senior Laborites issued dutiful, if lukewarm, praise for their new leader. Industry and Trade Minister Dalia Itzik said Ben-Eliezer, who trailed Burg by seemingly insurmountable double-digit margins until days before the September primary, should be commended for passing the test of "political bravery."

Haim Ramon defended Ben-Eliezer, saying it was "unwise" for Beilin to have "questioned the legitimacy of the party leader on the very day he was elected."

But Ben-Eliezer can take little solace in Ramon's remarks. He knows he faces another primary in a year to choose Labor's candidate for prime minister — it was Ben-Eliezer who suggested this two-stage format – and Ramon may be one of his rivals.

"Senior party members – none of whom backed him openly – will now wait vulture-like for Ben-Eliezer's defeat," writes Ha'aretz diplomatic correspondent Yossi Verter. "He'll try to embrace them and find that outwardly they'll stand behind him, while behind closed doors, they'll do their best to erode his authority."

Ben-Eliezer has history on his side: there has never been a Labor leader who has not served as prime minister.

But the Iraqi-born ex-general's biggest obstacle to becoming prime minister may be the state of his own party, which has been adrift since former prime minister Ehud Barak was soundly defeated by Sharon in elections last year. The intifadah and the public's subsequent sharp swing to the right have eroded the party's support, wich recent polls translate into a mere 18 seats for Labor, versus 32 for Likud.

Almost as formidable will be Ben-Eliezer's need to cement his leadership without alienating Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. Labor's elder statesman has been the party's senior member in the unity coalition until now, and has generally seen the party as his personal domain ever since David Ben-Gurion left the scene more than 30 years ago.

"Peres is not someone who lives in peace with the party chairman, as long as it's not himself," writes Verter.

Most Laborites were cautious when asked how Ben-Eliezer might treat Peres. "I cannot tell you what the formal arrangement will be, but I hope that Fuad [Ben-Eliezer] understands that he needs Peres next to him," Itzik said.

Beyond resuscitating Labor, if Ben-Eliezer wants to be prime minister, he will have to offer an alternative to Likud. To do that, he will have to lead Labor out of the unity government, and he will have to choose the right time and the right issue over which to "divorce" Sharon. Although Ben-Eliezer clearly derives great satisfaction from serving as defence minister, he said last week he would extract Labor from the government "quicker" than most think.

But not all the odds are stacked against Ben-Eliezer. He could be Labor's candidate for prime minister, regardless of whether he revives the party. Ben-Eliezer may find his rivals are happy to wait and let him be pounded at the polls.

Russian Jewish teens flock to Israel

By DANIEL NEHMAD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — More Jewish youth than ever from the former Soviet Union are visiting Israel on the Birthright Israel program during the next six weeks.

In the 18 months of the program's existence, a total of 1,547 people from the former Soviet Union visited Israel on four Birthright trips, said the CEO of Birthright Israel International, Shimshon Shoshani. But this winter alone, he said, "we are bringing almost 1,600."

The unprecedented number is largely due to an increase in funding for the Birthright program in the former Soviet Union.

But widespread interest in the program suggests that, unlike their western counterparts, Jews here have largely discounted the personal threat from Israeli-Palestinian violence.

"We also live in a country that isn't very stable," said Kirill Fishkin, 20, a student at the Kazan Aviation Institute in the central Russian city of Kazan. "So it makes no difference whether we're here or there. 'Which place is more dangerous?' That's not a question."

Fishkin hopes to participate in a second round of trips from the former Soviet Union planned for June.

Birthright Israel expects to send 6,135 young Jews to Israel this winter. Participants of the free 10-day trips include 3,149 North Americans, 1,596 Jews from the former Soviet Union and 670 from Latin America.

Program organizers initially had hoped to send more than 10,000 Jews this winter.

The indifference about travelling to a region known for explosive violence is affirmed by people who work closely with Jewish youth in Russia.

Natasha Bobkova, secretary of the Jewish Agency for Israel's youth department in Moscow, said that since October, only five people out of 42 have cancelled reservations made through the Jewish Agency, and those were due to university exams.

Meyer Newman, director of Arevim, the youth movement of the Federation of Jewish Communities of the Commonwealth of Independent States, reported that only about 40 out of 500 people who had made reservations through the federation have cancelled since October. The vacant spots filled immediately, he said.

Participants from the former Soviet Union face formidable local obstacles. Birthright requires each participant to pay a $150 deposit, which is later refunded, to ensure participation in the program once reservations have been made. This is quite a lot in Russia, where the average monthly wage is $113.

Nonetheless, participation has increased each year. Birthright reports that 90 citizens of FSU countries made the trip in the winter of 2000 and 714 in the winter of 2001. This winter, 1,050 will go from Russia, Belarus and the Baltic states, 450 from Ukraine and 42 from Uzbekistan.

Most of the new funding for this year's trips came as a private donation from businessman Lev Levayev, president of the federation. This is the first year the federation has sponsored Birthright.

A native of Uzbekistan who moved to Israel in 1971, Levayev feels obligated to build Jewish life in the former Soviet Union.

"Jewish youth today are eager to build their lives as Jews in the FSU," Levayev said. "Unfortunately their parents cannot provide the material support or spiritual help to build their lives as Jews. I see the Birthright trip as a means to fill this gap and guarantee a future of Jewish life there."

The federation's executive director, Avraham Berkowitz, said Levayev's donation will be responsible for sending 1,000 citizens from the former Soviet Union to Israel this winter and an additional 1,000 next summer.

But Birthright's fate in the region will not depend only on its ability to attract more participants.

"We are always working on evaluation," Shoshani said, emphasizing the need to examine whether and how participants are changed by the trips.

With this in mind, professors at Moscow State University, in co-operation with professors at Brandeis University in Boston, are planning to research how effective Birthright is in making participants more active in their Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union.

Argentine Jews arrive in Israel

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Hugs and tears awaited the first group of Argentine immigrants to arrive in Israel since riots erupted in Buenos Aires over the country's economic collapse.

The 63 new arrivals, young families as well as seniors, were welcomed last week at Ben-Gurion Airport by officials of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the Ministry of Absorption.

They were escorted to the Ministry of Absorption hall for orientation and initial immigration processing before heading to absorption centers in Beersheba, Ra'anana and Haifa.

For some of the new immigrants, there also were emotional reunions with relatives and family members.

"I'm happy to finally be home," Claudia, a Hebrew teacher, told reporters as she embraced her mother and sister.

Many new arrivals pointed out that their decisions to immigrate to Israel were not spontaneous decisions spurred by last month's rioting, but had been in the works for several months. At the same time, the ongoing economic difficulties in Argentina were a factor in their decision to emigrate.

"The vast majority who came did not decide on aliyah from one day to the next," said Yehuda Weinraub, a Jewish Agency spokesperson. "They had been preparing for some time. Many with whom I spoke made the decision last September or so. The economic situation was a main factor in that."

Many Argentine Jews have been falling into poverty since the mid-1990s, and as much as a quarter of the country's 200,000 Jews are believed to live below the poverty line.

"It's possible that now, after the difficult events in Buenos Aires, more Jews will want to emigrate to Israel," said Ruthie Romero, a computer instructor and graphic artist who arrived with her two children.

Jewish Agency officials in Buenos Aires said that, in recent weeks, they have received 300 percent more telephone inquiries and personal interviews for aliyah and 30 percent more inquiries from parents wondering about sending their children to university in Israel.

Kito Hasson, the Latin American representative of the Jewish Agency said the organization's Argentine office has extended interviewing hours until 10 p.m., and have opened on Sundays as well. The office has added five more employees to its staff of 21.

Given the magnitude of the current crisis – which eased somewhat with the resignation of President Fernando de la Rua on Dec. 20 and the subsequent ascension of Adolfo Rodriguez Saa, as caretaker president – the Jewish Agency canceled staff holidays in expectation of a flood of applicants.

"While worldwide aliyah to Israel decreased between 30 and 80 percent in 2001 because of the situation in Israel, in Argentina it has grown 30 percent," Hasson said.

In 2001, 1,400 Argentine Jews made aliyah. That's up from 1,033 in 2000, and is twice the 1998 figure.

"After this new unease, the Jewish Agency expects to have 3,000 Argentine Jews emigrating to Israel in 2002," said Hasson.

Jewish Agency officials in Argentina are currently processing some 7,000 applications – and are still receiving new inquiries.

Jorge Rusler, a car mechanic from Buenos Aires who arrived in Israel with six children, said he hoped to be able to work in his profession.

Another new arrival, Mariella, 14, described her mixed feelings.

"I'm here with my mother and father. It was hard for me to leave Argentina because of the many friends who stayed there," she told the Israeli daily Ma'ariv. "But it was important to leave because of the economic situation there."

Some 40 Argentines were due in Israel last week as part of the Jewish Agency's Na'aleh program, in which teenagers come to study in Israel and prepare the way for their families to make aliyah. Also expected was a group of 24 adults on a pilot trip to explore possible immigration.

The olim who arrived last week and those expected to follow will enjoy a special benefits package approved by the Israeli government earlier in the week, in consultation with the Jewish Agency and the Ministry of Absorption.

Valid for a year, the package includes $20,000 in government assistance to purchase housing – one-third of that a grant, two-thirds a low-interest loan – and a $2,500 Jewish Agency absorption grant, in addition to the existing benefits package all new immigrants receive.

The Jewish Agency Board of Governors decided last June to focus aliyah efforts on Argentina, France and South Africa.

In a meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last October, agreement in principle was reached to provide special benefits for immigrants from those communities. But no concrete measures were taken until the current crisis erupted last month.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce
The Sixth Annual
Passover Literary Supplement.

We invite the authors and poets among our readers to submit their works. The works must be previously unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction cannot be longer than 1,500 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than Feb. 15, 2002
Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our seventh annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning " drawings will be published in The CJN on February 21. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News,1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 2002. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim.The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 8, 2002.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning " pictures will be published in The CJN of February 21, 2002.

More French Jews emigrating

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — With French Jews complaining about a rise in anti-Semitic violence, there is a sharp increase in the number of people inquiring about immigrating to Israel.

After several years of declining aliyah from France, the Jewish Agency for Israel has seen a 30 to 40 percent rise in inquiries this fall, according to the director of its French office, Dov Puder.

"It is too early to know how many immigrants we will have for the year 2001, but usually the fall is a down time for applications, and March and April are the busiest months," Puder explained. "This is why this year is remarkable."

According to the French publication Aiyah Magazine, the Jewish Agency's French desk could expect between 2,000 and 3,000 olim every year through the late 1990s. That number fell to 1,950 in 1998 and 1,515 the following year.

Figures for 2000 are unavailable, but Puder said there was an additional decline.

In 2001, 1,150 French Jews emigrated to Israel. The recent increase in inquiries will not make a statistical impact until next year.

Regardless of the numbers, the typical profile of the applicant has changed very little, Puder said. French aliyah candidates tend to be very religious, and predominantly families with children.

Yet Puder did note a change in the reasons people came to his office.

"They are motivated by the situation in France as much as the situation in Israel," he said, "but they are more concerned than in the past with the situation in France."

Puder was hesitant to call the new candidates "worried" by the recent anti-Semitism, suggesting instead that they are "bothered" by it.

Moreover, he said, many of those interviewed recently emphasized their children's education as a reason for moving to Israel.

The increase in potential emigrants coincides with a recent rise in anti-Semitic incidents in the Paris region and Marseilles.

As of Nov. 15, French police had recorded 26 violent acts and 115 incidents of intimidation against Jews in 2001, according to the Ministry of the Interior. CRIF, the umbrella organization of secular Jewish groups throughout France, says the number is even higher.

The issue of anti-Semitism recently has become headline news in the French media, but many Jewish leaders feel the Socialist-led government has yet to take meaningful action.

Speaking at the annual CRIF dinner at the beginning of December, Prime Minister Lionel Jospin assured Jewish notables of "the determination of the government to fight against all forms of anti-Semitism."

Yet many in the community have grown disheartened that Interior Minister Daniel Vaillant – the man most responsible for national law enforcement policy – has continuously disputed the seriousness of the threats French Jews face on a daily basis.

Vaillant has claimed that most anti-Semitic violence is carried out by Muslim youths from low-income neighborhoods, which few dispute. But Jewish leaders increasingly are concerned about the consequences of the aggression.

Enrolment in Jewish schools has climbed over the past few years, a phenomenon that speaks to growing tensions between Muslim and Jewish youths. However, many middle-class Jewish families who share their neighbourhoods with Maghrebins – Muslims of North African descent – are unable to afford the rising cost of private education.

Sabra and Shatila survivors seek 'historic justice'

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — Lawyers for the Palestinians seeking to convict Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his role in the massacres at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Lebanon in 1982 told the Belgian court hearing the case last week that the judges would "stand before history" when they decided on the case.

Saying they were seeking "historic justice," the lawyers defined the case as the most important one to take place in a Belgian court since the end of World War II.

Following the evidence presented last week, Israeli observers in the courtroom said they were impressed by the level of legal preparation that went into the plaintiffs' case and the way the complex issues had been presented.

A source close to the case said there was no doubt the plaintiffs had used many experts, including historians, jurists and specialists in international law. The vast amount of material presented, he said, included material from a variety of Israeli sources.

The plaintiffs analyzed the events that took place in the two refugee camps where nearly 1,000 Palestinians were killed by Phalangist troops during the Israeli occupation of Beirut in 1982. They reviewed relevant legislative and court deliberations from Israel and presented Sharon's own positions on the issue over the years.

Israeli sources said it appeared the plaintiffs had benefited from help from inside Israel.

Last week's hearing, like the previous one, was devoted to the presentation of the plaintiff's case. Their claims did not include any new elements aside from their counter-argument to Israel's statements regarding the Belgian legislation that have won a degree of support from the Belgian state prosecutor's office.

Sharon's defence team raised the argument that the 1998 Belgian law established a special procedure for prosecuting a Belgian serving as prime minister, minister or member of the Belgian parliament. According to Sharon's lawyers, the procedure discriminates against serving foreign leaders for whom no special procedure had been established.

Drawing on minutes from the original debates on the issue in the Belgian legislature, the plaintiff's lawyers noted the special procedures were designed to preserve the separation of powers in the Belgian government that did not apply to foreign leaders. Furthermore, argued the plaintiffs, in 1998, the Belgian parliamentarians had not intended for the special procedure to be applied in cases of genocide, because of the 1999 amendments to the original universal authority promulgated in 1993, under which Sharon is being sued.

Beyond these claims, the plaintiff's lawyers also argued against defence lawyers' charges about the retroactive nature of the suit, the prime minister's diplomatic immunity, the Kahan Commission's prior investigation of the affair in Israel and the lack of relevance to Belgium.

As for the Kahan Commission, a major argument for the defence, the plaintiffs noted that in September 1982, Sharon voted against establishing the commission, and hence he could not now argue its conclusions are his defence because it rendered a judicial decision that put an end to the affair.

The next hearing is scheduled for Jan. 23, when Sharon's attorneys will present their defence. The court is expected to announce a date for its decision on the case during the same hearing.

Israel's feats deserve recognition

While the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians dominates the headlines, other newsworthy items from Israel are often overshadowed.

Israel's astonishing achievements in science and high-tech are one of these subjects. Its accomplishments in these fields are a testament not only to the country's talent but more broadly to the historical attachment of the Jewish people to education, liberal thinking and debate. It is noteworthy that about 15 percent of Nobel prizes have been awarded to a people constituting a mere 0.2 percent of the world's population.

According to Reports

So strong has this attachment been that three major institutions of higher learning – the Technion, Weizmann Institute, and the Hebrew University – were all established well before the State itself was, with Albert Einstein, world renowned scientist and dedicated Zionist, delivering Hebrew University's inaugural address in 1923.

Three factors contribute to Israel's technological achievements: a national policy of supporting research and development programs; the army, which provides the training ground for young people involved in technologically-oriented projects; and the Israeli culture that encourages risk-taking and innovative thinking. Today, high-tech accounts for roughly 75 percent of Israel's industrial exports, especially in the areas of software and biotechnology:

- Israel has 135 engineers, scientists and physicians per capita per 10,000 population – more than any other country.
- Israel has a large knowledge base in math, physics, computing and electronics, aided by the influx of hundreds of thousands of highly educated immigrants from the former Soviet Union.
- Israel is one of only eight nations to have developed, produced and launched its own satellite, entering the space age in 1988 with the launch of the Ofek Satellite.
- Israel ranks second only to the United States on a per capita basis in generating new high-tech companies.
- Israel has the world's highest ratio of high-tech start-ups – nearly 5,000 in a country of six million people.
- Israel has more companies listed on the Nasdaq Stock Market than any country except Canada and the United States.

The Canadian media have reported on a surprising number of Israeli scientific advances and technological developments in the past few years.

To mention just three:

- In the summer of 2000, Associated Press carried a story that had the ring of science fiction – an Israeli company (Given Imaging Ltd.) had developed a "swallowable video pill," a tiny video camera plus transmitter that fits inside a swallowable capsule which takes pictures at the rate of two images a second of the intestines.
- In a front-page story in the Globe and Mail (June 15), Krista Foss wrote about Israeli doctors who injected immune-system cells into the severed spinal cord of a paraplegic American teenager, restoring movement to her toes and legs.
- Bob Macdonald, CBC's award-winning science correspondent and host of CBC Radio's "Quirk and Quarks" described the Israeli step towards development of a molecular computer built from DNA in an interview with Peter Mansbridge on "The National" (Nov. 22).

The growth of trade relations in high-tech with countries like China and India, and the concomitant development of collaborative enterprises with scientists around the world, also deserve coverage.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Business Profile

Israeli-born economist perfect fit for media age

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It used to be that economists were seen as rather socially withdrawn individuals, dressed in dark suits with button down collars, poring over reams of data to issue a report on an obscure subject whose nuances could only be understood by others steeped in the "dismal science."

Not any more. Today, you're just as likely to find a garrulous, media-savvy individual who breathes life into the subject and who makes it relevant to investors and spectators alike.

Take Benjamin (Benny) Tal for instance. Tal, senior economist with CIBC, is a frequent contributor to ROB-TV, the business television network, as well as radio shows and CP24, a Toronto TV news station. Speaking with his unmistakable Israeli accent, he is articulate and entertaining even when dissecting the esoteric world of bond yields and currency fluctuations.

As an outgoing individual it's a skill that comes to him naturally. His experience on TV has allowed him to hone his skills and taught him that when articulating an aspect of economics, never just state the obvious; avoid complex explanations for fear of boring the audience to death. "You must try to explain economic situation in terms that people can understand," he said.

"Economics is about story-telling. That's the way I approach it. I think the numbers are secondary. Telling where the economy is going is like telling a story, with a beginning, and end and the ramifications."

It's not clear whether that's a new trend among economists who are applying it to the wider world, or whether the needs of TV and appealing to a mass audience have prompted changes in the economists' world. But Tal acknowledges that even when preparing reports for in-house use (by other divisions of the bank) or for external clients, making his findings relevant has become job one.

Gone are the days when an economist could simply provide a forecast on GDP or on interest rates. "Economists need to be more relevant," he said. "What does it mean for your business that GDP is going up or down? You must tailor it for individual clients."

Tal's specialties are the bond and currency markets, but he has also developed a special expertise on youth unemployment. In 1998 he released a study on the subject that "generated a bit of noise."

It was the kind of issue that appealed to the non-business press as well as the business media, and it wasn't exactly a typical banking issue.

Applying his maxim of making it relevant to the client, Tal noted that youths could be an important future client base for the bank. He found that official estimates as to the number of unemployed youth (16-17 percent) are probably three to four percent less than the actual number.

Another study for CIBC on self-employment examined job stability, compensation and whether work was full time or part time. Tal found that in 1996-97, Canada experienced an increase in employment, but not an expected growth in income.

During the mid-1990s, self employment grew by 40-50 percent to reach 15-16 percent of the labour market, but those leaving larger corporations for the independence of working for themselves generally experienced a drop in standard of living, to as much as 70-75 percent of their previous wage.

Meanwhile, in the United States unemployment dropped to near 4.5 percent and personal income rose 20 percent during the decade. Tal found that it was in Canada that people took more "McJobs," while in the United States, the quality of work improved as people took better paying jobs with larger corporations. Since 1998, "Canada's employment quality improved, but it's now falling again."

When he's not preparing in depth studies, Tal watches the financial markets on a daily basis, focusing on the Canadian dollar and the Euro. Like other economists, he sees the dollar trending downward on a secular (long term) basis with little hope of a major turnaround.

Tal, a native of B'nai Brak, the largely Orthodox community in central Israel, has been interested in economics since high school.

A top student from an early age, at 12 he was enrolled in the Steinberg Boarding School in Kfar Saba, where the educational standards were beyond anything offered in B'nai Brak.

"I know it was very hard for my mother, but in retrospect, it was a good thing," he said.

Tal was always interested in maths and sociology and in his last year in high school, he was introduced to a course in economics.

"I knew, that was it," he said.

Maths and physics, he believes, "are too exact. Sociology is not exact [enough]." Economics, he said, combines the quantitative aspect of maths with the examination of social behaviour of sociology.

After serving four and a half years in the Israel Defense Force (IDF), rising to the rank of captain in an artillery unit, he entered Hebrew University.

The school's economics department is first rate, he said, featuring top professors and a very high standard.

With a BA in economics, Tal earned a scholarship at Toronto's York University and moved to Canada in 1989. In 1991, during the Gulf War and after completing his masters degree in one year, he took a job with CIBC. His job: international economist focusing on the Middle East and one of his first assignments was to meet with the energy committee of the Iranian parliament. His concern that his Israeli heritage would be a deal-breaker proved to be unfounded.

With his improving facility with the English language, Tal was asked to represent the bank at various public occasions, and his reputation as a lively spokesman for the bank grew. Last year, Foreign Affair's executive speakers program asked him to speak about Canada to groups around the world, and he travelled to Australia, Germany and Holland on the mission. In March, he'll take his show on the road to Italy and Spain.

Tal retains a keen interest in his place of his birth, pointing out that Israel's economy grew by an average of five percent during the 1990s, compared to Canada's three percent. With a per capita GDP of $17,000 U.S., Israel is rapidly closing in on Canada's $25,000 U.S. and might pass it in 10 to 15 years, he said.

When it does, no doubt, Tal will be the first one called upon to explain it.

JEWISH FILM SOCIETY OPENS ITS 16TH SEASON

The 16th full season of the Toronto Jewish Film Society begins Sunday, Jan. 13 with the premiere screening of Left Luggage, a recent feature from Belgium-Holland about the identity struggles of a child of Holocaust survivors in Antwerp. The stellar cast includes Isabella Rossellini, Maximilian Schell, Topol and Jeroen Krabbe, who also directed. Krabbe is best remembered as the "other" love interest in Crossing Delancey.

The society has also scheduled an evening of tribute to Mordecai Richler on Feb. 17, featuring three seldom-seen films: The Street, Mortimer Griffin and Shalinsky, and Bambinger, all based on short stories by Richler and produced by the National Film Board of Canada.

The season also includes Sallah, a 1964 film by Israeli director Ephraim Kishon, starring Topol and Gila Almagor; it was nominated for an Academy Award.

Scheduled for April is the recent Dutch documentary, Maelstrom – A Family Chronicle, that uses home movies and other found footage to tell the story of a Dutch Jewish family from 1933 to 1945.

In June, the society is showing Tevye, the classic 1939 Yiddish film by Maurice Schwartz in which he plays the famous dairyman. Three more films follow in the fall: Caesar's Writers (US, 1996), Angry Harvest (Germany, 1984) and The Dunera Boys (Australia, 1985).

The society's chair, Barbara Coven, says that its mandate is "to educate and entertain, by bringing film lovers different perceptions of how Jews conduct their lives in different cultures, in both the past and present."

She adds that the society also tries "to screen films that aren't usually accessible to mainstream audiences."

A season's pass costs $50 and includes all screenings. Films are shown at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall at either 5:15 or 7:45 p.m., with individual tickets available at the door, 15 minutes before show-time. For details, phone 416-924-6211.

Musical Evening: The BJCC Koffler School of Music presents an evening of cello and guitar with Daniel and Carey Domb, at the home of Freema and Joe Trager, 111 Forest Heights Blvd. $60. Light refreshments. Wednesday Jan. 16, 8 p.m. RSVP, 416-636-1880, ext. 228.

Yiddish Conference: Milwaukee will be the focus of the Yiddish-speaking world April 12 to 15, 2002, when the International Association of Yiddish Clubs gathers for its seventh world conference. The theme is Yiddish and the Holocaust. Canadian participants include Eugene Orenstein, dean of Yiddish studies at McGill University. Registration is $260 before Feb. 1. 414-223-3443.

Harduf's Tenth Volume: "Dictionaries are like watches," Samuel Johnson, the 18th-century lexicographer once observed. "The worst is better than none, and the best cannot be expected to go quite true."

To extend the timepiece metaphor, the massive English-Hebrew dictionary that Torontonian David Mendel Harduf has been labouring over for years may best be compared to a top-quality Rolex watch. Its 10th volume, covering the entries from "S" to "Serbia," was recently printed here.

Harduf's dictionary has been hailed in Israel as a competent supplement to Eliezer Ben-Yehudah's landmark dictionary that helped modernize the language early in the last century. For each word, it features many illustrative quotations from classical and modern Hebrew literature, including Midrashic and Talmudic sources as well as King James equivalents for Biblical references in Hebrew.

According to the Jerusalem Post, Harduf "is someone who is clearly in love with Hebrew and its classical Biblical roots." Those interested in buying the dictionary should phone 416-663-5467 or inquire at Jewish bookstores.

Einstein play benefits Downtown Jewish Day School

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Einstein would love our little school," actor Alon Nashman said at a recent reception in support of the Downtown Jewish Day School.

Nashman, who played Albert Einstein in CanStage's fall production of Picasso at the Lapin Agile at the Bluma Appel Theatre, spoke after a closing night benefit performance for the school.

Nashman, whose daughter attends the school, said Einstein valued his intuitive faculties, which he called a gift from God, as much as his rational mind, which he called a faithful servant.

Nashman said he observed children at the school "expanding their capacity to imagine."

The integrated curriculum at the school "makes connections between subjects in the same way the mind intuitively cross-references learning," he said.

As an artist, it is important the way students grow to understand the world by creating, singing and doing, he said.

"Important to me as a Jew," he added, "is the way that our spiritual and moral heritage is being transmitted by a remarkable group of teachers to a wonderful and precious group of young souls who are renewing their heritage."

The Downtown Jewish Day school was founded by Cynthia Lazar in 1998 with 10 students. It now has 61 students up to Grade 5 and the school plans to add one grade each year.

Nashman, who has appeared in theatre, films and television, and is preparing for a one-person show adapted from Franz Kafka's Letters to His Father, said that when Steve Martin, who wrote Picasso, came to the opening performance, he said he never has to see the play again because it was the best production he had seen.

The setting for Picasso is a bohemian bistro in 1904 Paris, where an imaginary young Einstein and a young Pablo Picasso meet.

Alon's father, Harold Nashman, who organized the fund-raiser, introduced his son "Einstein," jesting that "sometimes it is difficult to have such a brilliant son."

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

ANOTHER SIDE OF THE KINNERET

"We're just about to cross the River Jordan," says our guide, Mike Rogoff, as our van approaches a bridge crossing a gulley of greenery. "So don't blink and don't sneeze, or you'll miss it. This is not the St. Lawrence. The people who wrote those marvelous spirituals – The River Jordan is deep and wide and so on –well, they had obviously never been here."

The day is predominantly warm and sunny. We are driving along the north shore of Lake Kinneret, the fabled Sea of Galilee, driving eastward along the top of the harp-shaped lake. Earlier, we had spent the morning viewing the remains of the Byzantine-era synagogue at Capernaum and some biblical-era sites on the northwestern shores. Now we are crossing Israel's famous river, whose legend apparently much exceeds the reality: today, by Canadian standards, it is a mere stream, even at the spot to the south where Joshua and the ancient Israelites entered the Promised Land.

The eastern side of Lake Kinneret is the more picturesque, yet fewer visitors see it, Rogoff says. As we drive along the lake, the cliffs of the Golan Heights soar above us to our left, while some mud flats and green patches stretch to the right, on territory surrendered by the Kinneret. As a result of extensive droughts and water usage, the lake has receded to record low levels in recent years. As the country prays for peace, so, too, it prays for rain.

Our guide points out a few moshavim and kibbutzim, including Kibbutz Ein Gev, which was founded in 1937 (the kibbutz was once home to former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek). Before Israel captured the Golan, they were "within spitting distance" of Syrian military outposts and "the Syrian soldiers would take potshots from the ridge about 1,500 feet about the kibbutz," Rogoff says.

"The people who can be quite liberal with the Palestinian issue can be quite hard-line with regard to giving back the Golan Heights to Syria," he says.

We pass some kibbutz hotels and an ostrich farm. Soon we reach the bottom of the lake and the spot where the river waters re-emerge from the lake to flow southward to the Dead Sea. As we cross the Jordan again, Rogoff points out a modern baptismal facility, used extensively by Christian pilgrims: it is modern enough to be wheelchair-accessible. The area is also dotted with historic kibbutzim such as Degania (established in 1911, it's the second oldest in the country) and the neighbouring Kinneret Kibbutz. Rogoff is an excellent guide, full of knowledge and surprises; here, he pulls to the side of the road, announcing that he's going to show us something that probably none in our party of four has seen before.

"Please follow me," he says, and we pass through the gates of Kinneret Cemetery. "This is a very beautiful cemetery," he says, pointing out the graves of several historic Zionists as well as young soldiers from the local kibbutzim who died in the War of Independence. In the earth in front of one headstone lies a soldier's helmet that "has been sitting there for 50 years, and no one's tried to walk off with it," Rogoff says.

We walk further into the well-treed grounds, which once abutted the lake and are now separated from it by a weedy expanse. The view, however, is still gorgeous, and the wind sweeps gently over the wild wheat as if it were the strings of a harp. He stops at a tombstone identified by the single Hebrew name Rachel, and we gather around.

"This is the most famous grave," he says. "You see how it is covered with stones?

"Rachel was buried here – Rachel the Poetess. Blaustein was her last name, but no one remembers her by that name. She's simply known as Rachel the Poetess."

Then Rogoff tells the story of Rachel, who was born in Russia in 1890. Imbued with Zionist ideals, she came to Palestine, settled on Kibbutz Degania and began writing Hebrew poetry that "even today, has a freshness and a flavour that speaks to the younger generation." Unmarried, she died here of tuberculosis in 1931.

"She had a great love affair with the area, and it all came out in her poetry. She spoke with great passion of her Kinneret and her Golan. She talked about 'Grandfather Herman' with his thatch of white hair. She also wrote about how she wanted children, but she never had any. Her poetry became more bitter and more personal, but no less beautiful."

He opens a small metal compartment beside the grave and removes a book of Rachel's poetry, chained there for visitors. He translates a short poem, evoking images that are poignant and pure, and without saying another word replaces the book and bids us follow him from the cemetery.

A highly memorable moment from a highly memorable trip.

Back in Canada, I found this poem by Rachel, translated by A.M. Klein:

The Childless One

Would that I had a little boy,
A wise lad, and with raven locks,
To take him by the hand, and walk
Slowly upon the garden-walks.
And "Uri" would I call my son,
A delicate name, and full of joy,
A name that is a sunbeam – such
The name of my small winsome boy.
Yet shall I grow bitter, like Mother Rachel...
Yet shall I pray, like Hannah in Shiloh...
Yet shall I wait
For him.

Israeli tour guide Mike Rogoff holds a book of poetry beside the tomb of Rachel the Poetess in the Kinneret Cemetery. [Bill Gladstone photo]

A remarkable year for Jewish video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The year 2001 has been a remarkable year for videos with Jewish themes. Here is a summary:

Divided We Fall is a dark comedy about a childless couple living in a small town during the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia. The couple hides a young Jewish man who was their neighbour before the war, only to discover that he is the only one who can keep the Nazis at bay. The film was nominated for an Academy Award last year for best foreign film.

Left Luggage tells the story of a Chassidic family in Antwerp, Belgium, who hire a non-religious college student as a nanny. The young woman quickly connects with the four-year-old son, who until then had refused to talk, and the two establish a special relationship. Produced in English, the film stars Isabella Rossellini, Maximilian Schell, Chaim Topol, Marianne Sagebrecht and Jeroen Krabbe. Krabbe, whose mother in real life is a Holocaust survivor, directed the film.

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg is a superb documentary that brings the 1930s and 1940s to life, describing how the American Jewish community basked in the accomplishments of one of their own in the all-American sport of baseball.

Into the Arms of Strangers is one of the best documentaries of the year. Producer Deborah Oppenheimer tells the story of the 10,000 children who were transported out of German-controlled Europe just before the beginning of World War II, and were brought to England for safety.

Anne Frank is the video version of the television miniseries. A more complete and more Jewish telling of Anne Frank's story, it gives much more background information about Anne and tells us what happened after the people in the attic were arrested and taken away.

Varian's War tells the compelling story of Varian Fry, a wealthy American who travelled to Vichy, France, during World War II and saved the lives of hundreds of Jewish scientists, artists and intellectuals.

Sunshine follows the rise and fall of a Jewish Hungarian family from the beginning of the 20th century to the fall of communism. It is a fascinating story and an acting tour de force by Ralph Fiennes, who plays three leading characters: the grandfather, the father and the son.

Yana's Friends, an Israeli film set during the Iraqi Scud missile attacks of the 1991 Gulf War, is a hilarious comedy about Russian immigrants to Israel and their integration into a new society.

Just Looking is a coming-of-age comedy directed by Jason Alexander of Seinfeld fame. The film follows a young Jewish teenager from the Bronx who is sent to spend the summer of 1955 with his aunt in the countryside in Queens.

Point Men tells the story of a Mossad cell whose members are systematically assassinated. The leader, played by Christopher Lambert, is determined to track down those responsible and eliminate them.

Minotaur is an Israeli film produced in English about a secret agent (Dan Turgeman) who becomes infatuated with a younger woman (Mili Avital). His fear that his work could prove dangerous to her well-being keeps them apart, but he sends her anonymous letters and gifts.

Brooklyn Babylon describes the tensions between the neighbouring Jewish and black communities in Brooklyn, tensions that are further heightened when a Jewish girl begins a torrid affair with a black rap artist.

Playing Mona Lisa is a comedy about a young Jewish piano student searching for love.

Voyages follows three women in Paris, Israel and Poland whose lives and memories of the Holocaust intertwine.

Solomon and Gaenor is a Romeo and Juliet story set in early 20th-century Wales. A boy from an Orthodox Jewish family falls in love with a Welsh girl and the two have an illicit affair with tragic consequences.

If Not Now, When? poses some food for seniors thoughts

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Seniors should volunteer, take up some physical activity, stop complaining that their children don't call them enough anymore and live their own lives.

That was the message of the play If Not Now, When? presented by the actors of the Act II Studio and the Seniors Education Program of the continuing education department at Ryerson University.

The play, written and directed by Verenia Ivonoffski, the artistic director of the Act II Studio, was performed at Holy Blossom Synagogue as part of a joint meeting of Haverim, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Lunch 'n Learn of Holy Blossom.

The cast included well-known actors Irving Hoffman and Eileen Garber, as well as actors Elaine Vayda, Linda May, Agnes Fisher, Patricia Bower and Claudette Gareau.

In the play, one woman plays hockey to keep active, another finds an opportunity to work as a volunteer, another says children have their own lives to live and seniors should not get upset if they do not hear from them, and another couple worries about the rent going up and how they will handle their budget. Seniors are advised to visit more and to get involved.

"The cast did fine work and memorized their lines well," said Pearl Caplan, head of Beth Tzedec's Haverim, which she founded six years ago.

"We found it very interesting and were pleased with the turnout of 180 people, including 20 from Forest Hill Place Retirement Home, and 50 from Haverim. It's the biggest turnout we have ever had for these joint meetings," Caplan said.

"We like to get together twice a year. They're just up the street from us," Caplan said of Holy Blossom.

The next meeting of the two groups will be in May when Lunch 'n Learn will be the guests of Haverim.

The next speaker at the January meeting of Haverim will be Prof. Corey Keeble, a curator with the western art and culture department at the ROM.

Alleged Nazi accuses Caplan of 'Jewish animosity'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Victoria lawyer Doug Christie launched his defence of convicted Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert by claiming "Jewish animosity" motivated Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan to initiate citizenship proceedings against his client.

Christie, whose client list includes Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel, Holocaust denier Jim Keegstra and the late John Ross Taylor, an early Nazi supporter, charged Caplan with a host of misdeeds.

"The actions of the minister against an ethnic German are an indication of reasonable apprehension of bias, are scandalous and vexatious, arising out of a conflict of interest originating in the Jewish animosity by [Caplan] to the defendant's ethnic background," the statement of defence alleges.

Seifert, a resident of Vancouver who worked in a sawmill before retiring, was convicted in absentia by an Italian military court for the murder and torture of prisoners in the Bolzano concentration camp.

Prosecutors' documents submitted in the Federal Court of Canada claim Seifert, an SS guard, was vicious and cruel in the treatment of prisoners at the Bolzano (Bozen) camp.

"Michael Seifert was personally involved in the beatings, the torture and the killing of prisoners in the camp and in the [camp's] isolation cells," the government's statement of claim alleges.

The documents allege that Seifert joined other guards in beating, whipping and killing prisoners. On one occasion, he allegedly poured cold water over a woman who was being held in the isolation cell block. She died shortly afterward.

Federal lawyers allege Seifert covered up his role in the camp when he immigrated to Canada and that he obtained his citizenship by fraud.

In the statement of defence, Christie claims Seifert was a prisoner during the time he was alleged to have served at the camp. He also argued that if Seifert withheld his background when he immigrated to Canada, it was because former German soldiers were being deported to the Soviet Union where they were killed.

Christie has filed a counter-claim against Caplan alleging malfeasance in her public duty.

Jamie Springer, a spokesman for the minister, declined to comment specifically on the Seifert case. "As a minister of the government, she is committed to doing her job in ensuring that Canada is not a safe haven for [alleged war criminals]," he said.

Len Rudner, a spokesman for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "Christie's statement is completely misplaced, given his client has already been found guilty of war crimes by an Italian court. It seems Caplan is acting justifiably in seeking to have Seifert removed from this country."

Bucks' owner has personal ties to Toronto

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — U.S. senator and Milwaukee Bucks owner Herb Kohl thinks the people of Toronto are fortunate to have Beth Tzedec Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl in their community.

All well and good, but there is more going on here than the kind of respectful words that might be expected from two astute public figures.

It's this: Kohl and Rabbi Frydman-Kohl are cousins who grew up together. Their fathers survived their early years in Europe and went on to emigrate to North America.

During WWI, their fathers, residents of Galicia, Poland, were taken as prioners by the Russians. As the family history tells its, the brothers saved each other's lives on more than one occasion.

Frydman-Kohl's father Jack saved Kohl's father Max's life by keeping guard over him during their imprisonment under the Russians. Later in life, Max immigrated to the United States and subsequently helped bring his brother to America.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and Kohl both grew up in Milwaukee as sports fans, with a particular love for basketball.

However, one of Kohl's best friends has been baseball commissioner Bud Selig, who grew up on the same street. They played sports together as kids and were roommates at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Kohl was one of the 10 original investors in the Milwaukee Brewers and says his interest in sports goes back a long time.

"I've always cared most about basketball," said Kohl, during a recent Bucks game against the Raptors at Air Canada Centre. "When the team was about to leave Milwaukee in 1985, I stepped up and bought it because I was interested and I wanted to help the community keep the team."

At the time, the $18 million price tag was the most anyone had ever paid for an NBA team. Kohl thought back then that it was a stupid investment – way too much money for a small-market basketball team.

A businessman by default, Kohl grew up re-stocking shelves on afternoons and weekends at the family's grocery and department store businesses. Later, he helped expand the business to 100 stores before serving as company president from 1970 through the sale of the corporation in 1979.

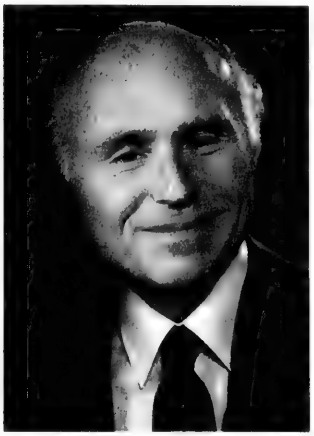
"I enjoy the opportunity to continue to be involved in business," he said. "I like the fact that I still keep my hand in business, which is something I enjoy a great deal."

The Bucks, meanwhile, are reportedly worth $125 million and coming off a season in which they fell one game shy of advancing to the NBA finals.

First elected to the Senate in 1988, the lifelong bachelor was re-elected to a third six-year term last year.

"He's both a modest and a moral political leader," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who was in Washington on two different occasions when Kohl was sworn in.

"He doesn't care a lot about public honour and he treats all people, even individuals considered to be not as important in society, with a great deal of respect."



U.S. Senator Herb Kohl

The 66-year-old philanthropist, who campaigns with his own money, donated $25 million in 1998 towards building the Kohl Centre, a $76.4 million state-of-the-art sports and entertainment facility that now serves as the home of the University of Wisconsin Badgers basketball teams.

Kohl's gift is the single largest private donation in the school's history.

However, he is most fortunate to have a cousin to count on in times of need. Rabbi Frydman-Kohl was by his side last year as he grieved his mother's death, officiating at the funeral and saying Kaddish for her during the year.

"There's not a finer person than Rabbi Frydman-Kohl as those of you who live here in Toronto know," said Kohl. "He's a great spiritual leader, a great person."

Hardwood hard times: No Jewish players in NBA

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When the Minnesota Timberwolves released Danny Schayes early in the 1999-2000 season, it marked the first time in decades that the NBA had been without Jewish representation on its hardwood floors. None have made it to the world's top professional hoops league since.

But that's not to say the NBA lacks a Jewish presence. In fact, among its top brass are commissioner David Stern, eight team owners, three general managers, and one head coach.

"Jewish people, as we know, are very talented in many different ways, as are non-Jewish people," said Milwaukee Bucks owner and U.S. Senator Herb Kohl, whose nephew Dan is the team's director of player personnel.

"Jewish people spread across society do many different things – athletically, intellectually, and professionally.

"It's been a magnificent opportunity for Jewish people over the last several generations to distinguish themselves in their communities and I think that's something we should be very grateful about."

Schayes, a first-round draft pick of the Utah Jazz in 1981, had a seven-stop 18-year career and was the only Jewish player in the league after the 1984-85 season, when current Bucks GM Ernie Grunfeld ended his playing career with the New York Knicks.

Dolph Schayes, Danny's father, was a 12-time league all-star and was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1972, making him arguably the greatest Jewish basketball player ever.

Twenty-nine Jews currently play Division I NCAA college basketball in the United States, so the possibility exists that another Jewish NBAer is on the horizon.

Among that group are small forward David Bluthenthal, touted as a potential All-American at the University of Southern California. Towson University sophomore point guard Tamir Goodman, an orthodox Jew who has received heavy media coverage, recently left the team after the head coach allegedly kicked a chair at him.

Dan Grunfeld, son of the Bucks GM, a Wisconsin high school senior shooting guard, recently signed a letter of intent to play next year at Stanford.

The last Israeli with a legitimate shot to play in the league was University of Connecticut star Doron Sheffer, a second-round selection of the Los Angeles Clippers in the 1996 NBA Draft. Sheffer returned home that summer after not being offered a guaranteed contract.

Leaving behind the mistrust

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

It might be time for Jews to consider an alternative to a belief that has retarded us from achieving a healthier life – the inherency of anti-Semitism in our world.

Most of us were educated as children about the anti-Semitism displayed by the Poles, Ukrainians, Germans, French, Africans, Arabs, Christians, Japanese, Communists, Canadians and even South Americans.

At an early age, we learned to distrust entire nations and continents. This devastating imperative, while protecting us, also helped to craft a Jewish state of mind that is limited in its ability to express trust for non-Jews, even when warranted. This approach might have made sense in an earlier time, but does it make sense for our future?

There are those in our community who will find this question to be apologetic in nature and anathema to their sense of Jewish pride. I have often heard Jewish community members say that "Anti-Semitism is inborn." Torah scholars might even encourage this conviction by quoting the famous biblical commentator, Rashi who states (Bereishit 33:4), "Esav soneh l'Ya'akov." Isaac's son Esau hated his brother Jacob, meaning, according to some, that non-Jews harbour an innate drive to hate Jews.

But the truth is that we are not hated by all non-Jews. The majority of the world's people have never met a Jew or even heard of us.

Not so long ago, a Jewish activist who had traveled the dusty roads of Africa and South America assisting the indigenous populations told me that "some of the locals struggled to find our horns [in reference to a popular biblical mis-translation] and expressed astonishment at their absence on our noggin". He added that "if anti-Semitism has existed among the villagers, it quickly dissipated into endearing nosiness and wonderment."

A colleague of mine arrived home from Eastern Canada telling of the extra fine care she had received after being recognized as a Jew by someone who had spotted the Magen David hanging around her neck. "Most people didn't know what a Jew was," she said, "But those who did were very loving."

For every story of hate against Jews, dozens of others exist of absolute indifference, unawareness or great endearment. We need to uncover the reality that not all non-Jews hate Jews, because we are deceiving ourselves by thinking otherwise.

Recently, I heard a story about a little Muslim boy in Regent Park who told a Jewish volunteer he was supposed to kill Jews when he met them. His Islamic teacher rebuked him harshly and later patiently explained the importance of tolerance and love of all people.

The time may have arrived for the newest generation of Jews to begin pounding the world's pavement and changing the feelings of people who have never really met us. They should influence those who are about as aware of Jews as we are about the Shona of Zimbabwe. And, yes, they should stand up against the hate-filled anti-Semites who remind us there is true ugliness in our world.

Anti-Semitism does exist and likely always will in some form. But we also study another passage in Rashi that quotes a Mishnah (Sanhedrin 37a, 38a) stating that God fashioned only two people from the dust (as opposed to a group) so one would not be able to say "My father was greater than yours" and so all creation would be born of the same roots and, therefore, from peace.

Perhaps we Jews should slowly ease out of our protective garb of mistrust, and instead try on attire made from the purple threads of hope, courage and communication. If we do not, we will voluntarily retain the title of the "world's persecuted people" – one that might no longer be true.

Portobellos Stuffed w/Carrots, Spinach, and Feta

4 med. Portobello mushrooms	3 med. carrots, diced
1 tbsp. olive oil	4 oz. spinach, shredded
1/4 med. onion, diced	2 tbsp. walnuts
1 c. Marsala wine	2 oz. feta cheese

In a large pan, sauté the Portobello caps in olive oil. Remove from the pan and set aside.

Add onions; sauté until softened, about 10 min. Add 3/4 cup Marsala; simmer until 1/3 cup remains.

Place mushrooms back in pan. Top mushrooms with veggie mixture. Add remaining 1/4 c. Marsala to pan. Cover and steam 4 min. until mushrooms are cooked through.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I recently noticed in the obituary section of the paper that an old friend of mine lost her mother.

This friend and I were very close for a long time and I knew her mother quite well. We had a falling out over something that now seems very trivial. I don't even remember what the whole thing was all about.

It has been at least a couple of years since I've seen or spoken to her but I think about her often. I really feel like I should go to the shiva but I don't know if I have the guts to walk in there after all this time. What if she is still angry with me and I make this already difficult time in her life even worse? I'm not sure I would even know what to say.

Do you think I should go?

Shiva Shy

Dear Shiva Shy,

You only have one chance to do the right thing and that is to show your friend that you still care. The two of you obviously have a special bond. It's unfortunate that it is at such a sad occasion that your reunion will take place, but it sounds like this was a silly feud anyway

I will admit that it will take a bit of courage for you to walk in the door, but I'm sure as soon as you lay eyes on each other, the past two years that you haven't spoken will be instantly forgotten.

Losing a loved one has a way of putting things into perspective. Suddenly all the small petty things that you were concerned about find their proper place at the bottom of the priority list. I'm sure emotions will run close to the surface for both of you, but don't let your fear stop you from showing your true feelings. Reach out physically with a hug and emotionally by saying something like "I'm so sorry." Everything will fall into place naturally; you don't have to plan out your visit.

Listen to your friend, she will need you now. I know you will feel very good that you made the effort to show you still care.

I always say, you'll never be sorry that you did – only that you didn't.

PA centre of terror network: Sharon

By ZE'EV SCHIFF and REVITAL LEVY-STEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

EILAT — Speaking at a press conference Sunday at a naval port in Eilat, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said that "the Palestinian Authority is a central part in the international terror network, with Iran at its centre."

Sharon made the comments from a dais set up outdoors alongside where the more than 50-ton weapons cargo from the ship Karine-A was on display. The IDF captured the ship destined for the Palestinian Authority (PA) in the Red Sea early last Thursday morning.

The prime minister also said PA Chairman Yasser Arafat "has made a strategic decision to thrust the region into war," adding that "with his behaviour, [Arafat] has made himself irrelevant and a bitter enemy of Israel.

"The ship and the weapons behind us are part of the Palestinian Authority's war of terror against us," he said.

Sharon repeated that Israel holds Arafat personally responsible for the weapons-smuggling attempt. "We must not be mistaken. This is the choice of the person heading the Palestinian Authority."

The prime minister also said that the weapons would have threatened every Israeli had they reached their intended destination. "The ship was on its way to Gaza's beaches and carried what was intended to threaten each and every one of us – in Tel Aviv as in Immannuel, in Haifa as in Ariel, in Herzliyah and Ashkelon as in Elei Sinai and Netzarim.

The News in Brief

CANADA

B'nai Brith Rapped

TORONTO — Now Magazine, Toronto's alternative weekly newspaper, has criticized B'nai Brith Canada. In a year-end list of "folks who need to be more prophetic than pathetic," NOW rapped B'nai Brith for "pumping up the anti-terrorist rhetoric here in Canada to create sympathy for Israel, [which] is divisive and irresponsible." The paper also lashed out at B'nai Brith's new press releases, which feature the headline "Jewish Canada Responds." Now comments: "And those 'Jewish Canada Responds' press releases? Who says they speak for Jewish Canada? Less venom, more understanding, please."

ISRAEL

Team to Peru

JERUSALEM — Israel is sending a special burn unit to Peru. The delegation of burn experts and plastic surgeons will treat victims of the recent massive blaze in Lima. At least 264 people were killed and hundreds injured when fireworks set off a blaze in a crowded shopping district.

Shabbat Bill

JERUSALEM — Israeli legislators are sparring over a bill that would change which establishments are allowed to open on the Sabbath. The bill would allow places of entertainment, such as theatres and cafes, to open on the Sabbath, while stores would shut. Lawmakers from Likud, Labor and religious parties back the bill. Meretz Party leader Yossi Sarid said he could not support a bill that would infringe on the standard of living of the secular public by shutting down large shopping centers that currently open on the Sabbath. But Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi, Yisrael Meir Lau, said both current religious and state laws are being flouted.

Growth Down

JERUSALEM — Annual economic growth in Israel in 2001 fell to its lowest level since 1953. The Gross Domestic Product fell 0.5 percent in 2001, after having grown by 6.4 percent in 2000. The global economic slowdown and the Palestinian intifadah were seen as the main reasons cited for the slowdown.

Population Rate

JERUSALEM — Israel's population rose in 2001 by its slowest rate since the 1980s. The slowdown to a 2.1 percent growth rate is attributed to a drop in new immigrants coming to the country. There are 6.5 million people living in Israel, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. Of these, 5.3 million are Jews and 1.2 million Arabs.

Bible Burning

JERUSALEM — The Israeli principal and sixth-grade teacher responsible for burning a Christian Bible at their religious school have been suspended. The education ministry said the two will remain suspended until a disciplinary committee makes a final decision on the matter. Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, called the act a desecration of God's name.

WORLD

Squadron Dies

NEW YORK — Howard Squadron, an influential lawyer, Jewish leader and civic giant, has died at age 75. A former president of the American Jewish Congress and chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Squadron died of cancer Dec. 26 at his home here.

Guilty Plea

LOS ANGELES — A U.S. man has pleaded guilty to exporting potential nuclear triggers to Israel. Richard Kelly Smyth, 72, who skipped bail in 1985, was discovered living in Spain and extradited to the United States in November. Last month, he pleaded guilty to illegally shipping some 800 krytrons – two-inch bulbs used to trigger nuclear bombs – to Israel in the early 1980s. Israel returned most of the devices after Smyth's 1985 indictment and has maintained they were never intended for nuclear weapons.

Jewish Conspiracy

RIYADH — A Saudi government newspaper has accused Jews of a conspiracy to rule the world. One article last month in the state-run Al-Watan ran under the headline, "The Jewish organizations are implementing their strategic hellish plan to take over the world."

Monument Unveiled

MOSCOW — A monument to Yiddish writer Shalom Aleichem was unveiled recently here. It stands near the site of the former Moscow Jewish Theater, which staged plays written by Shalom Aleichem, and was torn down on orders from Joseph Stalin.

Anti-Semitic Attacks

MOSCOW — Speakers at a recent event commemorating the 122nd birthday of Joseph Stalin distributed anti-Semitic literature and blasted Zionists. And in Krasnoyarsk, police are investigating after vandals spray-painted a local shul with swastikas and the acronym of Russia's largest neo-Nazi group.

Leader Quits

BERLIN — The head of an agency for German refugees quit recently after expressing doubts about the number of people killed at Auschwitz. The resignation of Paul Latussek, head of the Organization for Refugees, which represents Germans expelled from Nazi-occupied lands after the war was called the "the best way to secure the group's future," a spokesperson said.

RABBI MARVIN PRITZKER ל"ז

Passed away suddenly on December 7, 2001. Dearly beloved husband of Rose (Kanovsky), devoted father of Helene (Murray) Berkowitz, Alan (Brenda) Pritzker, Nachman (Henny) Pritzker, precious brother of Rose, grandfather of many.

Rabbi Pritzker was born in Cleveland, Ohio, son of the late Harry and Jenny (Grossman) Pritzker. He received his bachelor of arts degree from Yeshiva College, his rabbinical ordination from the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary of Yeshiva University, his master's degree in education from the University of Pittsburgh and his master's degree in Jewish history from Yeshiva University.

Rabbi Pritzker had pulpits in Aliquippa and Homestead, PA (Pittsburgh area), was teacher and principal of the Ottawa Talmud Torah and served as rabbi of the Young Israel of Ottawa before moving to Halifax, Nova Scotia where, for the next 17 years, he served as rabbi of the Beth Israel Synagogue of the Baron de Hirsch Congregation. Rabbi Pritzker was president of the Mizrachi Organization, both in Pittsburgh and Ottawa, and a long standing member of the Rabbinical Council of America.

Funeral services and internment were held at Congregation Bnai Torah in Toronto. Shiva was observed in Toronto.

Donations may be made in his memory at Mizrachi Organization of Canada (Toronto), Congregation Bnai Torah (Toronto), and Yeshiva Bais Moshe (Scranton, PA), or the charity of choice.

South African Politician Causes Ruckus

CAPE TOWN — A South African Jewish politician has caused controversy by calling for Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip – and disparaging Jews who disagree.

At a public meeting Dec. 7, cabinet minister Ronnie Kasrils launched a petition calling for people "of Jewish descent" to support "justice for Palestine." He addressed a small group under the banner "Not In My Name."

Kasrils lashed out at those in the Jewish community who had been critical of his stance, labeling them "conservative" and "reactionary."

Kasrills said the declaration "is hardly a radical position, it's a universally adopted one. Our argument is not dealt with by our detractors in South Africa, not even by the learned rabbis. Instead they denounce us in terms of personal vilification."

Kasrils' call, which attempts to link the suffering of the Palestinians to the treatment of black South Africans under apartheid, is creating public rifts in what normally is a united Jewish community.

Argentine Jews need 'urgent' aid, Jewish groups told

CJN News Services

Argentina's economic situation has become a full-blown crisis that requires urgent action by global Jewish agencies, states a briefing by United Jewish Communities (UJC).

The economic crisis in Argentina has led to violent demonstrations, looting and the resignation of several short-lived governments.

While there have been no reports of anti-Semitic activities linked to the crisis, and Jewish communal institutions, synagogues and organizations have not been affected by the rioting, new Jewish poor are being found each hour, UJC says.

"The situation is very difficult but fluid," said Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) after a telephone briefing last week for Jewish agencies in North America and Israel by Sallai Meridor, head of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). Meridor was in Buenos Aires overseeing JAFI's response to the crisis.

Silverstone said "so far" Argentina's Jews are "not at any specific risk – in fact, they've been assured by the authorities of their security." He said CJC is monitoring the crisis "very, very closely" and is in close contact with international Jewish aid agencies, as well as the Argentinian Jewish community.

JAFI reports the crisis has caused a dramatic rise in aliyah applications. It expects that in 2002, as many as 3,000 Jews from Argentina will immigrate to Israel. That's more than double the 1,400 who arrived in 2001, and up from the 1,033 who came in 2000.

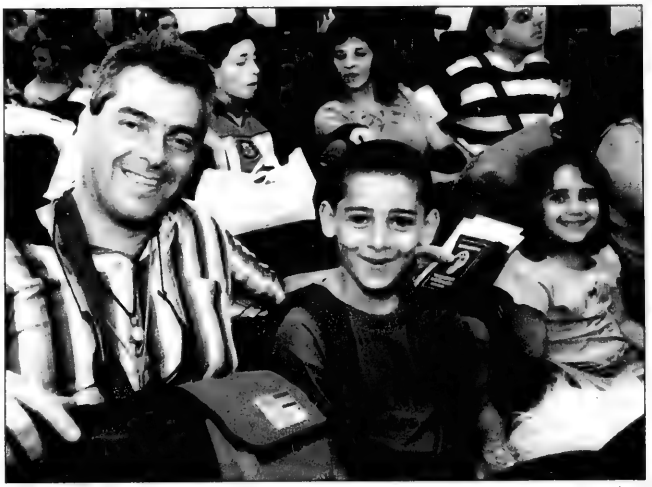
JAFI officials say that whereas worldwide aliyah decreased by between 30 and 80 percent in 2001, it will grow by 30 percent in Argentina this year.

What happens next for Argentina, and its 200,000 Jews, is uncertain, says the UJC briefing. What is clear, however, is that a coordinated and "focused response" is "urgently needed" from United Jewish Communities/the Federations of North America, and their overseas arms, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) and JAFI.

The federation system has been active in Argentina for years. In fact, a UJC mission to Argentina returned Dec. 9. And JAFI and JDC – both of which substantially intensified their efforts during the past four years of deepening recession – have taken quick actions in response to the current state of emergency. But the agencies say the situation is deteriorating so rapidly that an appropriate response is needed.

The Argentinian Jewish community, along with the rest of Argentina's society, is experiencing deep and widespread financial and psychological trauma. The country's unemployment rate is 20 percent.

The group said to be suffering the most is the middle class – the class to which most Argentinian Jews belong. These latest developments come after a series of serious blows to the Jewish community over the past 10 years.



The first group of immigrants from Argentina since the riots erupted in Buenos Aires recently arrived in Israel. The group was welcomed at Ben-Gurion Airport by Jewish Agency officials. [Israel Sun photo]

In Toronto, UJA Federation executive vice-president Allan Reitzes, who went on a fact-finding tour of Argentina several months ago, cites a loss of personal security among the country's Jews since the 1994 bombing of the central Jewish community building as a strong factor in the aliyah increase.

In order to handle the stream of aliyah applicants, vacations for JAFI employees in Argentina have been cancelled, and offices are staying open for extra hours.

At the same time, JDC reports that there is an immediate need to provide cash subsidies and food assistance to thousands of members of the Jewish community. JDC has arranged for temporary emergency funding, but more funds are needed.

While unemployment in Argentina stands at 20 percent, if the widely expected devaluation of the peso takes effect, that number could shoot up to 30 percent or more. Recent measures taken by the government have partially frozen bank accounts, resulting in a dramatic decrease in consumption in the three weeks leading up to Christmas.

Four years of recession has seen the emergence of the "new poor," those who were once middle class and wealthy – many even pillars of the community – who are now hungry.

However, Jews have not been singled out as a cause for this crisis, despite a history of Argentinian anti-Semitism. One reason may be that Jews are also visibly suffering and have been particularly vulnerable as retail and professional enterprises collapse.

Everyone has anecdotes of friends and acquaintances who have been suddenly struck by dire poverty. This anecdotal evidence is confirmed by the data: A community that traditionally had about 4,000 living below the poverty line has seen that number balloon to more than 25,000 in just the past two years. The crisis is expected to increase the number even more.

According to Ha'aretz, about 1,700 Jewish families in Buenos Aires alone are said to have lost their homes, and 300 of them are living in shantytowns, while others are crowded into rented apartments – often several families per flat.

The crisis has also led to a community organization crisis. Once home to over 60 Jewish day schools, Buenos Aires has seen the closure of more than 20 in the past several years as families have become unable to pay tuition. It's predicted a number of schools won't reopen when school reopens after the current summer vacation. Membership in JCCs, shuls and other Jewish organizations is similarly down, with an impact both on revenue and – more importantly – affiliation.

All this comes after a long series of demoralizing blows to the community. Perhaps the most serious was the 1994 bombing and subsequent cover-up by anti-Semitic members of the Buenos Aires police force. In addition, the community has been undermined by the collapse of several banks, resulting in over $20 million (US) in debt.

Despite the severity of the situation, the Argentinian Jewish community benefits from substantial assets, both internal and external. Internally, it boasts an extraordinary history of cohesion and excellence, including a first-rate corps of professionals and lay leaders. Externally, the co-ordinated efforts of JAFI and JDC, supported by the North American federation system, provide critical services.

Argentina has traditionally been a strongly Zionist community. Since 1948, JAFI has helped about 50,000 Argentinian Jews leave for Israel.

Looking below the surface

Below the surface, where the waters are deeper and less light has penetrated, it is often much more difficult for those peering comfortably from the shore to see with true clarity.

Last month, lack of clarity was very much in evidence when most of the western world criticized Israel for refusing to allow Yasser Arafat to travel to Bethlehem to attend midnight Christmas mass.

On the surface, the situation seemed clearcut. It was Christmas, after all, one of Christianity's most important religious occasions, one that resonates with profound meaning throughout the western world. Arafat, as president of the Palestinian Authority (PA), wanted to be in Bethlehem, a city under PA control, to take part in midnight mass. What did it matter that it was not his religious rite? He should be accorded the respect, if not the freedom, to participate in any religious ceremony he chose. Moreover, he had done so for the past six years. Why could he not do so again this year?

In the eyes of most of the western world, Israel was acting as a bully. The Vatican condemned the ban as "arbitrarily imposed." But Israel stood firm: unless Arafat moved against the assassins of Rechavam Ze'evi, he would remain in Ramallah.

Arafat never made it to Bethlehem.

In the result, Israel suffered a public relations setback. Even some die-hard supporters shrugged in quiet puzzlement if not disapproval.

But below the surface the situation roiled. And the constant cold light shining from the media and other condemnatory circles illuminated nothing, diffusing even before it touched the surface.

Notwithstanding the high profile positions held by some Christian Palestinians in the PA executive, most notably, Hanan Ashrawi, there is a great deal of tension "on the ground" between Christian and Muslim Palestinians. Indeed, so great is that tension, that Christian Palestinians are emigrating in large numbers out of PA-controlled areas. (Last year, Daniel Pipes wrote about that subject in The CJN*; Carleton University Prof. Paul Merkley also touches upon the subject in this week's Perspectives essay.)*

For example, Christians were always the majority community in the West Bank triangle between Bethlehem, Beit Jalla and Beit Sahour. In fact, the area was known as the Christian triangle. Even as late as 1990, Christians comprised 60 percent of the Arab population there. Today they represent 20 percent of the Arab total.

There are a number of reasons for that tension:

• The rise of radical, militant Islam has made living conditions increasingly uncomfortable for Christian Arabs. An educated, prosperous middle class, Christians have been constantly harassed and intimidated by younger, more militant Muslims for maintaining business ties with Israelis and especially for having sold land to Jews, now an offence under PA law punishable by death.

• In some instances, harassment of Christians has become physically ominous. In a much publicized recent case, a member of Arafat's Tanzim militia, who had been convicted of raping a Christian girl several months ago, was released from prison as a result of discrete interventions by his Tanzim colleagues. According to one report, only after much angry protesting by Michel Sabbah, the Latin patriarch in the Holy Land and himself no friend of Israel, did Arafat instruct his security forces to curtail harassment of Christians. But the rapist remains at large.

• The shooting at Gilo by Arafat's militia was conducted from predominantly Christian Beit Jalla. The Tanzim snipers actually chose their firing positions as close as possible to Christian religious institutions, hoping to draw devastating retaliatory fire from the Israelis.

• In Nazareth, a mostly Christian city in the Galilee, the Islamic Movement is building a mosque on an empty lot next to the Church of the Annunciation, one of the holiest sites in Christendom. The entire Christian community in Israel is vocally opposed to the erection of the mosque. Israel is caught in the middle trying to mediate a solution. But the waqf in Nazareth, the religious Muslim authority, will hear no compromise. Indeed they continued with construction during Christmas Day against the terms of a court injunction.

Arafat fraudulently represents himself to the world as the protector of the Christian holy shrines. But the majority of Palestinian Christians live in fear and have decided to escape his rule.

"Off the record," Ma'ariv reported last week, "Christians talk of harassment and terror tactics mainly from the gangs of thugs who looted and plundered Christians and their property, under the protection of Palestinian security police."

In standing up to Arafat, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon adopted a principled, moral position, refusing to submit to yet another of the countless charades by the PA president.

He was also sending a signal to the Christian Palestinian community. He would not be cowed by the unceasing PA brutishness in the way that so many of the Christian religious leadership – Palestinian and non-Palestinian – have been.

Given the portrayal of the facts in the media, it was not surprising that Israel was criticized. But the constant light directed at Israel by its critics did not penetrate into the real story that lay to be discovered just below the surface of Arafat's staged media event.

Women urged to study Torah through their own unique perspective

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women have the obligation to study and understand Torah through their unique perspective as women, says teacher, school administrator, scholar and writer Chana Weisberg.

"To have a relationship with God, we have to know what He expects of us," she said. "The Torah is a manifestation of His will."

These are not abstract philosophies for Weisberg. In 1996, together with Goldie Plotkin, rebbitzen of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, she founded the Women's Institute of Torah Studies, a program that taught subjects like Jewish history, Chumash, halachah and Talmud on a scholarly level.

Chana Weisberg

Although the courses were intense, women of every level of knowledge and Jewish education took part.

Weisberg always stressed the significance of feminine spirituality, teaching courses on that subject, as well as others such as Women of Greatness. When the institute was revived this past fall, with the help of Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, she built on this theme.

On Monday evenings, and then again on Tuesday mornings, Weisberg teaches a course called Feminine Voices, which explores the role of various women in the Torah. The first term dealt with Eve, and the second, which starts at the end of January, will study Sarah. A Mommy and Me program also runs Wednesday mornings in participants' houses.

The approximately 100 women enrolled this year, Weisberg said, use the class discussions as a springboard to talk about all aspects of women in Judaism in an "open, non-threatening way." A real bond formed between the women, she added.

Contrary to what many think, women are not second-class Jews, she said.

To understand the role of women in Judaism, "you have to look at the whole picture, not just a part of the puzzle."

Weisberg said chassidic philosophy holds that the role and mission of women is crucial. "They cause the purpose of creation to unfold. They may be behind the scenes, but they are pivotal."

What makes women second class, she said, is mimicking the male role. "We must find the feminine role – that is the way we will be empowered."

The key, she said, is learning, studying and knowledge. "If we understand on a deeper level, we can appreciate our importance."

These days, Weisberg said, "society is unfolding from the male role, which is characterized by violence. We are approaching the era of redemption, which will stress nurturing, rather than conquest."

Historically, she acknowledged, women may well have taken a lesser role. Now, however, with new communication technologies, emphasis is on working together and the importance of empathy – distinctly feminine qualities.

Education is essential, she insisted. "To educate our children and our families, we need to know what is expected of us, and what we can contribute."

Weisberg considers herself lucky – both to have had an education herself, and to have had been influenced by the thinking of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who "empowered women, especially by encouraging their education."

Besides running the Women's' Institute of Torah Study, Weisberg is dean of the Lubavitch seminary for women, Machon Bnos Menachem, and has written two books, The Crown of Creation (1996) and The Feminine Soul (2001).

She is also on the staff of the Web site www.AskMoses.com, not only answering questions, mainly on women and Judaism, but taking part in live chats. Recently, she has been a columnist for the New York weekly The Jewish Press. She lectures extensively throughout the United States and Canada. All this while running a household and caring for her five children, who range in age from three to 14.

"I try to do it in a way that would least affect them," she said. "If I ignored my kids to work on the computer, I would feel that I had failed."

She wrote her books "on pads of paper when I took the kids to the park, or between stirring a pot of soup," she explained with a laugh.

Weisberg plans to add programs that will be for both men and women, including lectures, mixed courses, and guest speakers.

Israel finishes first in Universities Debating Championship

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel won top honours at the 22nd annual World Universities Debating Championship, held at the University of Toronto last week.

Hebrew University captured the English-as-a-second-language prize, defeating teams from Tel Aviv University, India and Singapore.

Roy Weisner, a 25-year-old Hebrew University law student, won the public speaking award, edging out competitors from Canada, Australia, Britain and the United States.

This was Israel's best ever showing at the tournament, said Joe Brown, a 27-year-old member of the Hebrew University squad and an MA degree candidate in English literature.

Last year, a Hebrew University team reached the English-as-a-second-language finals in Glasgow, Scotland.

Israel was represented by four teams, with 30 debaters, at this year's championship: Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University, Haifa University and the Interdisciplinary Institute (IDC) in Herzliyah.

Hebrew University sent five teams, Tel Aviv University two teams, Haifa University three teams and IDC one team.

All team members were Jewish, said Brown, whose family made aliyah from the United States.

"We picked the best debaters, regardless of origin," he said.

The championship attracted 230 teams of two students each representing 108 universities from 30 countries.

Israelis debated Canadians from Queen's, the University of Alberta and the University of Ottawa, Brown said.

Teams participated in at least nine rounds, and were given 15 minutes to prepare for each round.

Topics, which ranged far and wide, also touched on the Arab-Israeli conflict: Should Israel negotiate with Yasser Arafat? Should political assassinations carried out by governments be considered legitimate?

Other topics included: Is the World Trade Organization a friend of the Third World? Should anorexics be force-fed?

Apart from Weisner and Brown, the Hebrew University team consisted of the following members: Noam Orbach, 28; Michal Amburg, 22; Shai Babed, 27; Joshua Gorteller, 22; Hanoch Wolpe, 25; Rivka (Rebecca) Zerkin, 21; Pazit Trebelsi, 24; Nurit Mor, 24; Eli Noverstern, 27; Amit Pundak, 24; Naomi Kriger, 24, and Keren Raz, 23.

Brown said he would not be surprised if some of the Israeli debaters eventually turn to politics and become Israel's future leaders.

MELTON HONOURED ON 90TH BIRTHDAY: Florence Zacks Melton, of Hebrew University's Florence Melton Adult Mini-School network for Jewish adult education (FMAMS), celebrated her 90th birthday last month at a gala evening organized by the American Friends of the Hebrew University (AFHU) in Boca Raton, Fla. In 1986, Hebrew University launched FMAMS, a two-year program of pluralist Jewish adult learning. Today, more than 5,500 students are studying in 63 mini-schools throughout the United States, Canada, England and Australia. Since FMAMS' inception, 17,000 individuals have participated. This is the third time that Melton has been honoured by Hebrew University. She received an honorary doctorate in 1991 and the AFHU's prestigious Scopus Award in 1997. Expert in Judaic studies to speak at BAYT

TORONTO — Lawrence Schiffman, an expert in Judaic studies, particularly on the Dead Sea Scrolls, will speak at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill on Jan. 27 at 8 pm.

His lecture and slide presentation on The Dead Sea Scrolls and the History of Judaism are part of the synagogue's adult education program.

Committee chair Melech Halberstadt said they asked Schiffman to speak "following his emergence into expertise on the Dead Sea Scrolls and how Judaism developed. He is the most knowledgeable scholar of the period from the Second Temple to the emergence of the early rabbis," Halberstadt said.

Schiffman is chair of New York University's Skirball department of Hebrew and Judaic studies, and is the Ethel and Irvin Edelman professor of Hebrew and Judaic studies. He is a member of the university's Center for Near Eastern Studies and the Center for Ancient Studies, and is president of the Association for Jewish Studies.

In addition to the Dead Sea Scrolls, Schiffman specializes in Judaism in late antiquity, the history of Jewish law and talmudic literature.

He is a newly appointed director of the Friedberg Genizah Project, which is designed to create a unified catalogue of all Cairo genizah fragments, as well as to publish a number of its unpublished texts. There is no charge to attend the lecture.

The lie is caught out, but the liar persists

The leader of the Palestinian Authority (PA) behaved last week like a little boy caught in a lie who lies even more to try to extricate himself from the sinking sand of public obloquy quickening around his feet. But this leader is no little boy. And the obloquy is not merely the passing hurt of schoolyard ridicule.

Once again it was Yasser Arafat proving to anyone interested in knowing the truth and honest enough to acknowledge it, that he is utterly devoid of scruples and integrity.

Barely more than two weeks after he again solemnly, publicly pledged to renounce terrorism he is thwarted in his attempt to bring into his arsenal an ominously more dangerous, upgraded level of offensive weaponry.

Last week, the IDF captured a boat in the Red Sea that was carrying a 50-ton cache of arms and advanced weapons that included mortar shells, anti-tank missiles, anti-tank mines, sniper rifles, Kalashnikov rifles and Katyusha rockets. According to the IDF, the ship, the 4,000-ton Karine A, was purchased and owned by the PA. The commander of the boat, Omar Acawi, and several members of his crew belonged to the PA naval police. The weapons themselves and the waterproof containers in which they were packed to ensure undamaged arrival on shore somewhere in the Gaza, were supplied by Iran.

As Ze'ev Schiff, the renowned military analyst pointed out in Ha'aretz, the attempted smuggling by the PA of this amount and this type of weaponry has "far-reaching strategic meaning" for Israel.

- Iran's involvement in the export of arms to the PA has now been fully exposed. It is an active participant in the campaign being waged against the Jewish state.
- The Katyusha rockets and mortars were obviously intended to escalate the conflict against Israel and broaden the attacks into the country's very heartland. From Gaza, the rockets could have penetrated into Ashkelon; from the West Bank, the rockets could reach Ben-Gurion airport and the heavily populated coastal plain.
- A demand of the PA for a total ceasefire will not be enough to advance the peace process. Israel must now demand that the PA confiscate illegal firearms as well.

Arafat denied any connection to the arms shipment. But the evidence is beyond dispute. It is both inconceivable and improbable that so large and so costly an effort would have been approved and planned without his knowledge, let alone involvement.

Israel of course will not ignore the implications from the capture of this enormous boatload of weapons. Nor should western governments. For it is from the West, including from Canada, that Yasser Arafat obtains a large portion of the funds with which he chooses to buy the materiel and weaponry for the escalated war he clearly intends to wage against the Jewish state.

An ark on the sea

Sheldon Kirshner's story about the Struma's sole survivor (CJN, Nov. 8), brought back memories of my own survival experience which I would like to share with your readers.

My family and I were also listed to leave Romania on the Struma. However, at the last minute my maternal grandmother decided against it. Together with approximately 120 passengers, we departed in October 1942 from the port of Constanza (or Braila) on a very small, intolerable cargo boat named Vitorul; it had a cranky engine and was unfit for humans.

The boat limped in the Black Sea until the engine died. A crack opened at the bottom of the vessel and water started seeping in. People shouted; children screamed; chaos ensued. The waves pushed the vessel towards the Turkish shores and we all ended up in the cold waters.

The Turks, contrary to their behaviour towards the Struma victims, helped all of us to shore. They allowed us to stay in tents on the beach for the night but without water or food. The following day, we were transported to a village where we were housed in community halls and offered meagre food by the villagers. Most of us were sick with dysentery, typhoid and influenza.

Meanwhile, our plight was the subject of diplomatic discussions between Turkey and Britain. Eventually, all the Vitorul passengers were transferred to Istanbul where we boarded another ship that was escorted by a British patrol boat directly to Cyprus. We spent the rest of the war in Cyprus in quite comfortable conditions, as the first British-interned illegal immigrants to Palestine. Ultimately all of us, including my grandmother, reached Palestine in 1944-45.

Shine Eisenfeld immortalizes the details of this story in the Hebrew-language book Ark on the Sea published in 1947 by Sifriat Poalim.

Justice was not mocked

The editor may be correct in stating in "A week when justice was mocked" (CJN, Jan. 3) that Eli Hobeika should be charged for the murders of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon in 1982, but certainly justice was not mocked when Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was accused.

The military commander in charge at the time, Sharon knew or should have known that allowing the Christian militia into the camps would end in disaster. He was and is responsible for his actions. He could have avoided the massacre, as he was the supreme commander, and ordered Hobeika not to enter.

The entire chain of command in the Sabra and Shatila camp slaughter should be held accountable, from Sharon and Hobeika downward.

Riegner's telegram was delayed

The story "Holocaust hero dies at 90" (CJN, Dec. 13), about the death of Gerhart Riegner, who was the representative of the World Jewish Congress in Switzerland and sent the telegram on Aug. 8, 1942, telling the world of the Nazi plan to murder Europe's Jews, was incomplete.

Riegner did indeed send the telegram to Rabbi Stephen Wise in the United States, but it was held up by the U.S. State Department. Riegner however, also sent the same telegram to Sidney Silverman, a member of the British Parliament. It was Silverman who sent the Riegner message to Rabbi Wise, and it finally reached him on Aug. 28. Rabbi Wise then went to see the U.S. vice-president on Sept. 10.

It was the British who exposed the planned genocide by the Nazis when foreign secretary Anthony Eden read a statement to the House of Commons on Dec. 17.

It took four months for the Riegner news to reach the world. German industrialist Dr. Eduard Schulte had risked his life to reveal the Nazi plan to Riegner. After months of delay, the news evoked only a warning to the Nazis but no attacks on the death camps, which was what Schulte had contemplated.

Generalizations don't work

I agree with the sentiment conveyed by Darcie Richler in "Solidarity with Israel – more is better" (CJN, Dec. 13), that the situation in the Middle East tends to be over-simplified here by those sympathetic to Palestinian refugees or statehood. However, the answer is not to ignore and disregard these people. If their arguments contain "obvious falsehoods," as she says, we should be able to refute them.

I cringe when I hear someone complaining about "the Arabs" or "the Palestinians," as if these were completely cohesive groups who all think and act alike, just as I cringe when I hear people talking about "the Jews."

The labels "pro-Palestinian" and "pro-Israeli" are also unnecessary generalizations. They cast people into pre-determined moulds and imply that you must take either one side or the other. Unilaterally declaring oneself or someone else as being on one side or the other does nothing to promote tolerance.

The World Council of Churches – and Israel

As a Christian, I would prefer not to have to quarrel publicly with bodies of the church who are entrusted with studying the problems and issues of our time and achieving statements of position. Still, it seems that the World Council of Churches (WCC) cannot handle issues in international relations, among other lesser issues, without getting them dangerously wrong.

This fatal failing is illustrated again by the WCC's leading role this past September in achieving the denunciation of Israel for "systematic perpetration of racist crimes including war crimes, acts of genocide and ethnic cleansing," at the Non-Governmental Organizations (NGO) sideshow of the United Nations Conference on Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophopia and Related Intolerance held at Durban, South Africa. Since its triumph at that conference, the WCC has advanced further than ever before in its contempt for the suffering of Israel and in the vehemence of its denunciations of any and all Israeli actions of self-defence. (A roster of recent WCC statements on "Israel/Palestine," together with history of the role that the WCC has played in NGO actions and statements, can be found at www.wcc-coe.org). Closer to home, many readers of this paper will know of the conference that the Anglican Church in Canada, always in the vanguard in WCC deliberations, held in our capital city in late October for the purpose of immersing its clergy in the Palestinian rhetoric of abuse of Israel (See "Palestinian Anglican Priest Under Fire," Ottawa Citizen, Nov. 4).

There is a real danger that Jews, like other outsiders to the church, might exaggerate the force of these churchly statements in the misguided belief that they represent the views of Christians generally and that they must have a theological root. However, Canadian Jews who are baffled by this record should keep several things in mind:

First: Few Christian laymen pay any attention to WCC statements. This is a mixed blessing, at best, since it is this inattention on the part of the laity that makes it possible for the elites to run up the banners that capture the shocked attention of passerby. Any outsider who approaches Christian laity in the sincere spirit of the researcher will soon discover that among persons who tell the pollsters that they attend church regularly, support for Israel is a few degrees higher than it is in the population as a whole, where it nowadays runs very high indeed. This is just one instance of a general truth about the widening gap between elite opinions and public attitudes that pops up wherever you look – in the media, in the schools, in government.

Second: We should note that the WCC buys its anti-Israeli rhetoric wholesale from the Middle East Council of Churches, headquartered in Cyprus, which represents the historic churches of the Middle East, those who make up the majority of local Christians in Israel as well as those under the Palestinian Authority (PA). Most of these churches still maintain and celebrate the doctrine of Supersessionism (or Replacement theology), to the effect that all the promises which God made to Abraham and to Israel now belong to the church – a doctrine which has been explicitly repudiated by all western churches, including the Roman Catholic Church. These are preponderantly Arab congregations, conditioned by some 14 centuries of subservience within the world of Islam.

The notion that we find in WCC documents, that the creation of the State of Israel was a mistake and the cause of all the unhappiness of the "indigenous" peoples of the Middle East, comes from this source. And from this same source, the WCC gets the shell-and-pea arithmetic that it uses to document the alleged flight of Christians from Israel since its creation. The truth is that Israel is the only polity in the entire Middle East of which it can be said that its Christian population has grown (modestly) over the past half-century in absolute terms, while remaining constant as a percentage of the whole population. Elsewhere in the Middle East, it is rapidly approaching extinction. While the exodus of Christians from PA-controlled areas has multiplied since the PA became the local authority, the number of Christians in Israel continues to grow – in part because so many have fled from the PA to the Israeli side of the Green Line.

Third: Leaders of the WCC have actually little interest in persuading the members of their own churches, whose minds are on other things, but rather their ambition is to be acknowledged by the UN as the conscience of the world. When the WCC was born at Amsterdam, in August 1948 (three months after the State of Israel came into existence), it adopted the motto: "Man's Disorder, God's Design." The thought was that the WCC would speak for the Christian conscience which, they imagined, still informed the thinking of the statesmen of the West. Since then, the process of secularization of public institutions in the West, coupled with the shift of the political arithmetic in the UN, has brought the result that to be the conscience of the world is to be the leader of the Third World bandwagon. Sensing this, the WCC dropped its rhetoric about God's Design in the 1970s and became the champion of "liberation."

In a perverse sort of way, I draw some comfort from the fact that positions on international political matters taken by inter-church bodies, by annual meetings of member denominations, and by interchurch journals of opinion have invariably been exposed as incorrect as history unfolds. Being proved wrong never leads these bodies to apologize, however, as they are much too busy getting to the head of the parade on the wrong side of the next historical issue.

Take, for example, the world issues of the 1930s. As a historian, I have, for my sins, spent long hours studying church journals, interchurch journals of opinion, and policy statements representing in the 1930s roughly the same constituency as the WCC claims to speak for in the year 2001 – namely, "Christian Opinion." I find that they habitually get it wrong. They were wrong about Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, "sober-minded statesmen" intent on bringing self-respect to their abused people. They were wrong about the prospects for peace, preferring to believe that an understanding attitude towards the perfectly reasonable agenda of Hitler made it reprehensible on our part to prepare for war. They lionized Neville Chamberlain, and loathed the "war-monger" Winston Churchill. They were silent on Hitler's persecution of the Jews, opposed to Zionism, and vocal in support of British restrictions on Jewish immigration to Palestine in 1939. They opposed relaxation of immigration restrictions which prevented the flight of Jews and others from the territories of Germany and its "allies" to North America. All of this is abundantly documented in many scholarly books. But who reads books? Not the statesmen of the church, who have to dedicate all their hours to policy statements. Not the chairperson of the many social justice committees of the many member-churches, who are even now clipping these WCC statements for display on church bulletin-boards.

Not to put too fine a point on it: the WCC is wrong. It is wrong about U.S. President George W. Bush and about U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and about Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; it is wrong about PA Chairman Yasser Arafat; it was (and continues to be) wrong about President of Zimbabwe Robert Mugabe and Cuban leader Fidel Castro; it is wrong about Sudan and it is wrong about Iraq. But here I must get a grip on myself.

Just a little attention to the actual wording of recent WCC statements on the "Palestinian struggle for liberation" and on the well-known congenital behaviour of Jews and of their political allies everywhere will bring to mind the anti-Semitic propaganda which Hitler sowed throughout the world in the 1930s – not excluding the English-speaking world. This is the language imposed by an imagined Christian duty not to be found in disagreement with the world-view of Islam. This language makes eminent moral sense to Reverend Jesse Jackson. Thank God it is seen for what it is by Bush and Powell – both of whom, incidentally, belong to churches whose members will now be asked to sign on to the WCC/NGO statements.

Remembering the Struma

Some weeks ago, it was my privilege to attend the premiere of another path-breaking film by Simcha Jacobovici. Entitled The Struma, it deals with the fate of a ship that in 1941 was launched from the Romanian City of Costanza on the Black Sea.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Nearly 800 Romanian Jews were crowded aboard, hoping to reach the Promised Land of Palestine.

The Nazis were at the height of their power and threatened to extend their influence to the rest of Europe.

Shortly after the voyage began, the Struma's engines failed and forced the vessel to stop at Istanbul harbour. Turkey, so the historians assert, was prepared to give the refugees sanctuary, but changed its mind under British pressure, while the refugees languished, packed like sardines in their prison ship, without food or water. Toilets were overcrowded and disease threatened to erupt.

Eventually, the Turks tugged the disabled vessel back into the Black Sea, and the Struma floated aimlessly. But 12 hours later a submarine, perhaps considering it an enemy vessel on the attack, sank it with a single torpedo. Seconds later the sea was filled with the dead and dying, amongst whom were 100 children. There was only one survivor and he is still alive. His name is David Stoliar, and he was present when I attended the premiere in a crowded theatre.

It was not quite the riveting drama I had expected, but it was memorable nonetheless. The Struma has always been, in my book of memories, a symbol of the unwillingness of European nations to provide a safe refuge for the Jews who were fleeing oppression. The ill-fated ship was just one example amongst many – testimony to the unwillingness of European nations to provide even the most fundamental humanitarian help for the 800 Jews who were fleeing for their lives.

The Struma remains a symbol of the moral failure of Western nations to rescue Jews in flight from their pursuers. Somehow, in those days, being Jewish seemed to exclude one from the rest of humanity, and only the fewest nations treated our people with respect and accorded us a welcome.

Many decades have passed since those days and we would like to forget them. But Jacobovici's film somehow does not permit that easy escape. We still need to remember the 800 who went down in the sea and make sure that never again will any of our people be left undefended from the claws of their pursuers. The Struma reminds us of a period in our history that can repeat itself only if we abandon our self-respect and negate the fundamental concept of belonging to am echad, one singular people.

Brotherhood takes it on the chin

It hasn't been a good year for brotherhood, the family of humankind, governmental actions or individual behaviour. Are we stumbling towards a better year, or heading for worse in 2002? The signs are not encouraging.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

On individual behaviour: terrorists in North America and Israel had a good year, killing thousands in the United States, hundreds in Israel. By their own twisted logic, they were doing the will of a supreme being and therefore acting – the words stick in the throat – with uprightness that will reward them in the hereafter. To us, their evil is obvious. It brings only heartache and advances no cause except that of chaos and hatred. Yet hundreds of thousands took to the streets and rejoiced at the tragedies. Many, including the usually insightful John Ralston Saul, found an excuse for this behaviour: the United States had it coming. One can only hope that Canada does not deserve the same for practising and promoting democracy.

How did brotherhood fare? Not much better. We tried, after 9/11, to believe the best of Islam, but we all have a long way to go. This is not so surprising. It has taken centuries for Jews and Christians to speak frankly and with understanding to each other. Muslim leaders are just realizing that they need to begin meaningful participation in dialogue, not just with non-Muslims, but, more importantly, among themselves. Many who teach Islam preach hatred of the "other." Only when Muslims change these teachings can we begin to make sense of each other's universes.

Public utterances have not been encouraging, as many Muslim leaders drift between distancing themselves from the event ("No good Muslim would…") and denial ("Prove that it was…"). But someone obviously taught the terrorists that, indeed, good Muslims would do exactly what they did.

Nor have governments covered themselves with glory. As I write, India and Pakistan are eyeball to eyeball across a dangerous nuclear chasm. Israel's neighbourhood continues to deteriorate. Arafat may have given one speech redolent of peacemaking, but a second speech smelled worse – because he was franker. "Our people have been facing this plot ever since the Zionist Congress in Basel where the phrase 'A land without a people for a people without a land' was coined," Ha'aretz reported him as saying. "One hundred and four years later, our people are still standing strong against the magnitude of this plot." Is he again denying Israel's right to exist?

Arab textbooks abound with anti-Semitic canards. Egyptian TV airs a 30-segment show on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, featuring a popular actor. Anti-Semitism permeates Arab statecraft. Not much there for peacemakers to work with.

What about Canada? Lip service in favour of Israel, but votes at the UN for increasingly harsh resolutions that defame Israel. This dualism did no good for Israelis or Palestinians, while it aligned us with despicable autocrats. What we could have in common with Syria, whose government murdered 20,000 people, or murderous Iraq, escapes me. We not only look stupid, but we become irrelevant to effective participation in any peace process.

I am anxious about 2002, although there are some hopeful signs. Arab/Muslim countries did not come to the aid of the Taliban. People began to care more about the women of Afghanistan. But, sadly for the Middle East, Arab countries paid lip service to the intifadah while adding nothing to a search for peace. (Hopefully the prominent Palestinian Sari Nusseibeh may be given a real role to play in that search.)

Reflecting on 2001, Andrew Sullivan writes: "Part of the essence of civilization is the slow accretion of social and civic trust that enables us to live together in highly complex and interdependent ways." In Canada, shared rules of ethical behaviour allow us to live together in a multicultural society. We need to encourage that civic trust and show a frazzled world that multi-religious societies can thrive.

Social and civic trust is not built on demonizing the other or rejoicing in their suffering. Fanaticism in a cause does not lead to trust, but always in the opposite direction. So too do excuses for evildoers and cowardly UN votes. Will we have another year of terror and death? We stumble when we forget that, as Einstein wrote, "Man is here for the sake of other men."

A letter to Mr. Ghassan Elashi

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Dear Mr. Ghassan Elashi,

I can't say I'm sorry that the organization you head, the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, is currently "out of business," as you put it recently to the New York Times. After all, the reason for your change in fortune is that your computers, records and half the $10 million dollars you raised this year have been seized by the U.S. government after an FBI investigation concluded that the Holy Land Foundation was raising money to support a Middle Eastern terrorist group.

That group, Hamas, seeks to destroy Israel, as you know, and over the past 14 months alone has claimed responsibility for killing more than 100 Israelis. It recently appealed to Arab ministers and diplomats meeting in Qatar to support its continuing suicide attacks against Israelis. I hope you understand that I cannot but be gratified when the would-be murderers of my relatives are hampered.

Your own organization, originally known as the Occupied Land Fund, has long been accused of being a front for Hamas, though in recent years you have carefully avoided terms like "jihad" and "intifadah" and stressed humanitarian activities. When the Dallas Morning News published several articles exploring your connections to Hamas, you even sued the paper for defamation.

Now, though, the U.S. government has weighed in, with, among other evidence, what it says is a tape of a meeting where you and five Hamas leaders discussed how the Middle East peace process might best be violently subverted. Credit card records, moreover, purportedly show that your group paid for fund-raising trips around America for prominent Hamas activists.

If the accusations turn out to be true, you can assume that I, and most Americans, will find it exceedingly difficult to summon sympathy for you. We don't take well to people whose hands are stained with the blood of innocents, especially these days.

But entirely aside from anything you and your organization may have done, I am personally outraged by something you said to the Times reporter.

He had questioned you about comments made by one of the Hamas representatives whose trips you had allegedly bankrolled. In 1994, Sheik Muhammad Siyam told the Muslim Arab Youth Association in Los Angeles, "It's simple. Finish off the Israelis! Kill them all! Exterminate them! No peace ever!"

To your credit, you disowned the particular sentiments expressed. Somewhat less to your credit, you excused yourself as not being responsible for them. And to your shame, you then tried to defend Mr. Siyam by adding, "I thought we had freedom of speech here."

But what was most ugly of all was what you said next.

"But anyway," you went on, "it's the same thing when American Jewish organizations raise money. They always say, we need to get rid of the Arabs, they're roaches, that kind of thing."

Mr. Elashi, I work for a large Jewish organization. As an Orthodox group, it is likely more "hawkish" than some others on issues pertaining to Israel's security. The sons and daughters and mothers and fathers of many of our members study or live in Israel, and all of our constituents wholeheartedly believe that the Holy Land was entrusted to the Jewish people by God Himself.

And yet, having heard hundreds of speeches and presentations at Agudath Israel meetings, conventions and seminars, I must tell you that I have never heard anything remotely like what you asserted is commonplace in the Jewish community.

The Jewish religious tradition teaches that every human being, whatever his or her colour, ethnicity or beliefs, is created in the image of God, and I believe that wholeheartedly, as does every Jew I know. I bear no animosity toward any person of goodwill, whether he is my Christian neighbour in New York or a Muslim Arab who wishes to live in peace on the land I believe is the home of the Jewish people.

Yes, I am angry at those who have maimed and killed in the name of Islam or the "Palestinian cause." Yes, I pray daily that those who want to harm me or my fellow Jews will be frustrated in their plans. And yes, because of the heartless and brutal actions of people like those you are accused of abetting, I am finding it increasingly hard to assume goodwill on the part of some.

But I still try mightily to do so. And I believe not that "we need to get rid of the Arabs" but rather that Arabs and Jews in the Middle East and everywhere else should live in peace with one another.

Sincerely,

Avi Shafran.

Jews of Brazil have moved up the ladder

Soaring and imposing, the Grand Templo Israelita finds itself marooned on Rua Tenente Possolo, a drab street in Centro, a dilapidated working-class area of Rio de Janeiro now bereft of Jews.

In 1932, when this white, Moorish-style synagogue was inaugurated, Rio's immigrant Jewish community was concentrated in gritty Centro, far from the tropical glamour of the city's airy beaches, luxury hotels, swank restaurants and upscale stores.

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

But as Jews left this district behind them and moved to leafy middle and upper class residential enclaves in Botafoga, Copacabana, Ipanema, Gavea and Barra Da Tijuca, the Grand Templo Israelita, formerly known as Beit Yaakov, Rio's first Ashkenazic shul, gradually lost its congregants and its raison d'etre.

"Regular services stopped about 10 years ago, when it became increasingly difficult to raise a minyan," said Ruy Flaks Schneider, the 59-year-old president of the synagogue, a merchant banker whose grandfather, Jacob, was one of its founders.

Today, like a beached whale, the Grand Templo Israelita, modelled after a synagogue in Trieste, Italy, is starkly out of its element in Centro, a gray-hued neighbourhood clustered with ugly tenements, decrepit shops and itinerant fruit vendors, all within walking distance of the Lapa red-light district.

But as odd as the Conservative shul may look in its incongruous urban setting, it still has a vital communal role to play. Refurbished two years ago, its hardwood floors and benches gleaming, it is used on major Jewish holidays and for special occasions such as weddings and bar mitzvahs.

Ruy Flaks Schneider

If nothing else, the Grand Templo Israelita is a telling metaphor of the strides, economic and otherwise, Brazilian Jews have made in the past 70 years.

Comprising less than 1/10 of one percent of Brazil's population of 175 million, Brazilian Jews are mainly the descendants of European and Middle Eastern immigrants. They arrived in this vast, developing country – the biggest in Latin America – in the first four decades of the 20th century. They came, primarily, from Poland, Romania and Germany, settling in cities like Rio, Recife, Sao Paulo, Belo Horizonte and Porto Alegre. But decades before their disembarkment, Jews from Morocco and Turkey had already established themselves in Brazil.

Jews, in fact, were among Brazil's first European settlers. They came originally as New Christians, or newly-converted Roman Catholics. Pedro Alvares Cabral, the Portuguese explorer, landed in Brazil in 1500, accompanied by Gaspar da Goma, his New Christian personal secretary.

New Christians, some of whom practised Judaism secretly as Marranos, were involved in the emerging sugar, rice, cotton and tobacco industries. Some were even slave traders. By one estimate, a significant proportion of the Portuguese settlers in 16th century Brazil were New Christians.

With the arrival of the Dutch in northeastern Brazil, Marranos embraced Judaism openly. In Recife, they built a synagogue, Zur Israel, the first shul in the Americas.

When the Portuguese reconquered Recife in 1654, the Jews were driven out. Some sailed with the Dutch back to Holland. Still others wandered to Dutch Caribbean islands. A group of 23 Jews ended up in New Amsterdam, a Dutch colony that would morph into New York City.

Anete Hulak

The New Christians who remained in Brazil after 1654 were eventually absorbed and totally assimilated. For all intents and purposes, the Jewish community in Brazil after the 17th century ceased to exist.

The next wave of Jewish immigration occurred after Brazil's independence from Portugal in 1822. Sephardi Jews from Morocco and the Ottoman Empire streamed into Manaus and Belem, the citadels of the rubber trade and the gateways to the Amazon rainforest. Later, some drifted into Rio.

By the late 19th century, Jews from the Russian empire, racked by pogroms, began settling in Brazil, which, in the meantime, had been transformed into a democratic republic free of religious discrimination.

Sponsored by the Jewish Colonization Association, a handful of Bessarabian Jews set up agricultural colonies in the southern part of the country. Among them were Philippson and Santa Maria.

Between 1920 and 1928, Brazil's Jewish population tripled to 30,000. Among the arrivals was Anete Hulak, who, at 98, is the oldest living Jewish person in Recife today.

In 1937, the Brazilian populist dictator, Getulio Vargas, an admirer of Benito Mussolini, enacted secret regulations aimed at restricting the entry of Jews into Brazil. But these edicts did not achieve their intended effect, and still more Jews flowed into Brazil, according to American scholar Jeffrey Lesser.

As a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict, a further wave of Jews, predominantly from Egypt, Syria and Lebanon, poured in. Giuseppi Taman, a merchant from Alexandria, was one of those Middle Eastern immigrants. He arrived in 1957, and has lived in Recife since then.

The Grand Templo Israelita in Rio de Janeiro

By common consent, Brazil is home to approximately 130,000 Jews, making it Latin America's second largest Jewish community after Argentina. But since a formal census has never been conducted, and reliable demographic information is sorely lacking, there have been claims that as many as 300,000 Jews actually reside in Brazil.

Sao Paulo, Brazil's booming business capital, has the greatest number of Jews, at 60,000. Rio, with about 40,000, is in second place, followed by Porto Alegre, with 10,000. The remainder are scattered in cities ranging from Brasilia, the federal capital, to Salvator, in the northern state of Bahia.

Instititionally, Brazilian Jewry is rich and varied, with an array of organizations, agencies, synagogues, day schools, cultural and sports clubs, old age homes and community centres.

In a nation plagued by appalling poverty, where $72 (US) is the monthly minimum wage and where miserable favelas (shantytowns) spill down menacingly from green hillsides into fashionable neighbourhoods, Jews have fared reasonably well.

Although the majority are members of the middle class, which has felt the chilling effects of a slowing economy and a declining currency in recent years, there are Jews in Brazil whose wealth is legendary: the Safras in banking, the Klabins and Feffers in pulp and paper and the Sterns in jewelry.

To some, the yawning economic dispartities here are a source of immense concern.

"We are sitting on a volcano, and it is not dormant anymore," warned Henry Sobel, the senior rabbi at Sao Paulo's Congregacao Israelita Paulista. "The high rate of violence in our country is the most visible sign that the volcano is erupting. It is a constant preoccupation of our government and of all citizens with a minimum of sensitivity."

Schneider, however, begs to differ.

"I don't really think that Brazil, in spite of the current economic situation or the great disparities that still exist, is sitting on a dormant volcano." Nor, he claimed, would the spectre of a worsening economy pose any special threat to Jews, who are extremely well-integrated.

In general, Jews feel eminently comfortable in Brazil, a mixed-race society in which whites, blacks, mulattos and indigenous peoples mingle easily, at least on the surface. Jews, therefore, have been the beneficiaries of what Brazilians commonly refer to as their "racial democracy."

In this tolerant, live-and-let-live milieu, where open anti-Semitism is a fairly rare phenomenon and where racial incitement is punishable by law, there are no discernible obstacles to social mobility, said Schneider, whose ancestors migrated from Eastern Europe about a century ago, and whose father-in-law was an admiral in the Brazilian navy.

Before World War II, many Jews earned a livelihood as peddlers, but their sons and daughters have turned to the professions. Traditionally, Brazilian Jews stayed clear of politics and the civil service, but in recent years this has also changed. The current foreign minister, Celso Lafer, is Jewish, as are two of the directors of Brazil's central bank.

"This is a society where Jews enjoy a free life," observed Schneider, whose wife's grandfather, Mordechai Guertzenstein, was Brazil's first Ashkenazi rabbi.

Schneider is right, yet the Jewish community has inevitably paid a price – assimilation and intermarriage – for the openness of Brazilian society.

Stem cells and the Torah

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Science fiction has taken a step closer to becoming science fact. On Monday, Nov. 26, Advanced Cell Technology Inc. (ACT) of Worcester, Mass., announced to a stunned world that its scientists had succeeded in cloning human embryos.

Comparative Law

That a human would be cloned was inevitable. "Dolly," the now-famous sheep, was the first successful cloning in 1977. Many other animals have since been cloned. Dolly began her life as an egg whose nucleus had been removed and another inserted in its place. The nucleus contains the genetic blueprint of life. The egg was then implanted into a surrogate mother where it grew as an exact copy of the animal that provided the nucleus.

Similarly, ACT took a human egg and replaced its nucleus, tricking it into dividing itself into a small ball of multiple cells. Conceivably, these, too, could be implanted into a human surrogate mother, carried for nine months of growth and born as a carbon copy baby of the donor nucleus.

But creating a human being is not the goal of ACT or of a number of other such competing laboratories. Instead, the race is on to grow these cells to the point where they will divide and begin to develop, each to its own purpose: one group, kidney cells; another, lung cells; another, skin; and so on. These are known as stem cells.

Stem cells are like seeds, each having the capacity to develop into a distinct organ. The desire is to grow healthy organs, or at least organ tissue, from these stem cells. This tissue could then be implanted without fear of infection or of being rejected by the donor. Conceivably, there could be an unlimited supply of organs able to replace diseased and malfunctioning ones, or simply ones ravaged by age. The possibilities are as sensational as they are endless, and indeed, they hint of immortality.

If what is happening in the world of scientific research was inevitable, the resulting world reaction was equally predictable. ACT's experiment was quickly vilified by politicians, the Vatican and scientists alike. U.S. President George W. Bush promptly addressed Congress, British Prime Minister Tony Blair addressed the House of Commons and Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien addressed Parliament. World leaders cried out for direction to govern this biotechnology, if not to stop it altogether. Ethicists were summoned to determine what is right and wrong. Legislators were called to quickly make laws defining what is permitted and what is not.

As Jews who believe in the divinity of the Torah, we find little value in these ethicists. Judaism is not situational ethics, where one looks at contemporary issues and reports the social norms of acceptability in order to offer guidelines. Essentially, these are not really guidelines but merely reflections of current societal mores. To the Jew, ethics do not reflect society, they define it. Jewish values are a constant; they do not fluctuate with the tides of time. Our ethics and values are the goals of our people rather than the result of contemporary opinion. Boards of ethics are like the general, who, when losing control of his men, faces the direction of the mob and shouts, "Follow me!"

What, then, is the Jewish position on cloning and stem cell technologies?

Our Torah teaches us the supremacy of life. It tells us that guarding life is more important than even guarding the Torah itself. Notable exceptions to this rule are made when one tramples on the laws of immorality, idolatry and bloodshed. One is to abstain from these three, even when life is at stake. Clearly, killing one life to save another is contrary to God's plan.

To address the question of stem cell technology, one needs to establish whether growing these human cells in order to harvest them as spare parts when needed is killing one life to save another.

Judaism teaches that life begins at birth; hence the possibility to kill life can only begin at the same time as that life begins. In Judaism, an unborn child is not life but the potential of life. Certainly an unborn child may not be aborted, but to do so is not killing. It is wrong. It is forbidden, but it is not killing.

There is yet at least one other stage in the process of life: the period of 40 days immediately following conception. At this stage, the budding of life is viewed to an even lesser degree. For stem cell technology to succeed, the growth of the embryonic cells must be stopped after a matter of days in order to harvest the stem cells well within this 40-day stage.

Categorically, Judaism does not see the artificial growth of human cells on a laboratory dish as a human life. Although this fact alone is an absolute in Judaism, further reasoning is always acceptable and even welcome. For example, it is routine in medicine today to grow human skin for use in skin grafts. Growing stem cells should then be seen in the same light. Arguably, there is a world of a difference between the growing of skin and growing a whole potential person. Yet this too is already not uncommon; in vitro fertilization is widely practised as a last resort for couples unable to conceive by other means.

Are we playing God? Is life so sacred that we must leave certain things untouched? This same question could be asked any time one is ill and seeks a cure. Judaism never said, "If you are ill, it is God's will, do not intervene!" Quite the opposite: "and cure you shall cure." God commands us to aggressively and creatively pursue every venue to a healthier life.

The ethical tempest that has now overwhelmed the world emanates from the Christian right. What a travesty this would be if their bias could succeed in halting one of the most promising advances of humanity.

On a line stretching from the beginning of time to the present, the human experience has not changed all that much. It is only in these last centuries that God has given us the capability to combat hunger with high-yield commercial food production. It is relatively recently that we have fast forwarded into expanding horizons of transportation and communication. But by far the greatest accomplishment and advancement in human endeavour have been in the eradication of suffering, disease and needless mortality.

God is now presenting us with this further gift in the march of human experience. We are being ushered into a new and exciting era, one of good health and even better life. To reject this gift is to turn God down. It is as much an affront to the very life that these people profess to protect as it is a reversal of the progress of humanity.

Jewish Life

Some distilled wisdom

Books
Bernard Baskin

Books that offer advice for more successful living are legion. Several cross my desk every month. What follows is the distilled chochma of what many of them contain.

Our society is built on a division of labour; every kind of work is important to the whole. As long as a person does what comes to his hand to do, and does it with honesty and diligence, he is contributing to the sum total of human good. The food we eat, the clothes we wear are the products of thousands of skills and hundreds of hands. The teacher, the banker, the inventor, the engineer, the designer, the weaver, the electrician – each is vital to the entire process, and if one fails in his task, then all of us are the poorer. Each of us is important – no matter what his work or profession – to the welfare of all others.

Moreover, there is no positive correlation between success and happiness. Are the famous and celebrated of the earth the happiest? On the lofty peaks of success are to be found loneliness and insecurity. High positions create the tensions that result from onerous obligations and the need to make significant decisions.

The wealthiest persons must wonder, at times, if they are admired for themselves, or the favours that they can bestow. Who would not trade his fortune for the restoration of the health we usually take for granted? Some of the most admired of personalities would trade fame for obscurity if it could bring the assurance of a secure home and loving children. What the world regards as success is often a sham and illusion.

As the new year dawns, you will be a successful person in 2002 if you:

- will find the resources – regardless of your age and position – to keep your mind alive, active and curious;
- will be able to get along in mutual understanding and regard with your spouse and your children;
- will find a measure of meaning in your work and the satisfactions that come from the knowledge that you are earning your bread honestly and without deceit;
- can be guided by your own standards and values, rather than by those of your neighbours;
- have won a few good friends whom you admire and who add a measure of zest and comradeship to your life and activities;
- are able to accept the good and bad life with equanimity; not made arrogant by the former or embittered by the latter.
- can spend some time alone and make use of your own resources without falling into loneliness or panic;
- can forget yourself long enough and your own problems to reach out in genuine concern and consideration for others;
- can feel that you are reaching for your full potential and experiencing new ripening of mind and spirit.

How long will we continue to identify bigness with greatness, price with value, activity with achievement and position with success? Too long have we boasted of our standard of living. May we, in the new year, be able to boast of our standard of life.

Selecting a summer camp

BY MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It may be the middle of winter, but if you are looking for a Jewish summer camp, now is the time to choose. Fortunately, many camps and Jewish youth movements have created Web sites. And that makes comparison shopping much easier for parents of prospective campers. Today, an overview.

There are well over one hundred Jewish camps in North America and it is beyond the scope of this column to list them all. But there are some very good sites that will do that for you. The Jewish Camp Guide is broken into Canadian and American regional sections, in addition to international listings. It lists more than 150 camps, including all-girls, all-boys, kosher and sports camps [http://www.jewish.com/ camps/].

If you can't find your favorite camp on the list, you can ask them to add it.

Moment magazine maintains a similar list of Jewish camps in addition to a list of camps in Israel that cater to North Americans [http://www.momentmag.com/resources/campguide.html]. And you can also check out the Association of Jewish Sponsored Camps [http://www.jewishcamps.org/] which represents 33 not-for-profit children's and adult camps, including five camps for people with special needs.

There may be many Jewish camps to choose from, but every year campers are turned away because the camps just cant meet the demand. The Foundation for Jewish Camping wants to do something about that. The foundation was started in 1997 by Robert and Elisa Spungen Bildner, a New Jersey couple. It has already provided $200,000 (US) in grants to help camps expand. It is working to triple Jewish camp attendance and believes the Jewish camping system requires 100 new camps. [http://www.jewishcamping.org].

As campers grow up, they embark on their next challenge: as counsellors. The Jewish Camp Staff Web site is designed to help counsellors and Jewish camps find each other. Counsellors fill out online staff profiles (listing skills, education, religious affiliation, etc.) that can then be used by camps looking for summer help. At the moment, this site is used by two dozen Jewish camps [http://www.jewishcampstaff.com/].

But according to an article in Jewish World Review, some camps are having a tough time finding counsellors. Camps find themselves in competition with fast food chains and theme parks for summer help. And some college students prefer to go for jobs and internships that are connected to their careers. In order to hold on to staff, Jerry Kaye, director of a Reform camp in Wisconsin, has even awarded $1,000 scholarships to counselors who return for a third year of work [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0600/lure.html].

To help fill their staffing needs, many Jewish camps turn to Israeli teenagers. These teen shlichim play a crucial role at Jewish camps around the country. They introduce North American campers to the human side of life in Israel [http://www.campramah.org/news/shlichim.html]. You can read more about the importance the State of Israel has played in Jewish summer camps in a comprehensive article by David Friedman and David Zisenwine [http://www.israelives.org/camp/camps.html].

How do you know if the time is right to send your own children off to camp? Ellen Nash, director of Ontario's Camp Northland – B'nai Brith says "around age nine or 10 is ideal for many kids to begin to go to camp. Twelve is sort of the top end." Ask yourself: "Do they like being with groups of kids? Are they comfortable sleeping over at other kids' houses? Those are good signs." [http://www.todaysparent.com/school_age/article.jsp?cId=3927]. The Family Education Web site also has some very good articles about talking to your kids about camp, homesickness and even camp packing tips: "Send nothing to camp (except your child) that you can't afford to lose." [http://www.familyeducation.com/topic/front/0,1156,22-5197,00.html]

Once their kids are off at camp, parents will fret until they get mail. Then they may fret even more. Eileen Goltz has accumulated some choice letters from campers. After two weeks at camp, one postcard home started with "My counselor is a witch. I hate everyone in the cabin. But other than that, I'm having a great time." [http://www.clevelandjewishnews.com/camp/]

And then there was nine-year-old Stevie Palmer. "He wrote that his counselor was taking the whole cabin to see a cannibal and that he wasn't sure why, and could his parents call the camp and find out because he was afraid someone would get eaten. Turns out it wasn't quite that exciting. It was just a field trip to Cape Canaveral and nobody from Stevie's cabin was on the menu."

Jewish, Muslim students share college dining hall

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SOUTH HADLEY, Mass. — Sharon Adams, a Jewish student at Mount Holyoke College, recently sat down with a Muslim student and got into a conversation about the challenges of remaining religious in college.

An outgoing, newly Orthodox exchange student from London, Adams might have started the discussion anyway. But it was a little easier because the two women could share a meal – one that was both kosher and halal – while they chatted.

At a time when Jewish-Muslim relations in America are strained, many Jewish students find themselves on the defensive from anti-Israel rhetoric and Muslims are fearful of being lumped together with Osama bin Laden, this elite New England women's college is a rare haven of relative harmony.

Two days after the Sept. 11 terror attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon, Mount Holyoke opened what is believed to be the first kosher-halal dining hall at an American college.

"This was just the best thing that could have happened at that time," said Nadia Rahim, a Muslim senior from Bangladesh. "There was such a feeling of co-operation and partnership."

Dartmouth College is opening a similar facility later this month, and there are preliminary discussions about creating kosher-halal facilities at other universities, including the University of California at Los Angeles.

The centrally located dining hall – a homey room with floral wallpaper, pink curtains and comfortable wooden chairs – serves 80 to 100 students per meal, the majority of whom are neither Jewish nor Muslim but simply live in the nearby dorm.

With its relatively small Jewish and Muslim populations – Jews make up about six percent of the school's 2,000 students, and Muslims about four percent – Mount Holyoke might seem an unlikely spot for the country's first kosher-halal student dining hall.

Some students new to kosher and halal restrictions are grumbling about the new rules, but most students praise the cafeteria for its tasty food – by institutional standards, at least – and the implicit message that Jews and Muslims have "more in common than separates us," as one Muslim student put it.

The project took off last year when Muslim and Jewish students approached the administration, complaining that they were outgrowing the small student-run kitchen they shared in the religious life building. Administrators warmed to the idea, saying it "resonated with the core values" of the school, which has a large number of international students.

After an anonymous alumna contributed $250,000, the college scrambled to convert Wilder Hall. The kitchen was redone over the summer, new equipment was brought in and staff were trained on everything from separating dairy and meat items to scrutinizing ingredients like mustard and vanilla to ensure that they are alcohol-free, a halal restriction.

Even before plans for the dining hall emerged, Jews and Muslims here enjoyed good relations, leaders of both communities say. In addition to the small kitchen in the religious life building that they used to share, the Muslim and Jewish chaplains have adjoining offices, and they have come together each winter for an ecumenical celebration called "The Festival of Lights."

Some credit the smooth relations to what they say is a female tendency to be a little more peaceful and diplomatic than men.

"Because we're all girls, we tend to be more calm about these things," Adams said. "We're a little less aggressive."

But another element of the harmony may be the general environment. On the campus of elegant red brick Gothic Revival buildings, gracious trees and open grassy areas, genteel civility, friendliness and multiculturalism seem to be religions in their own right, and the two sides generally avoid discussing the Middle East, at least with each other.

Even in the aftermath of Sept. 11, when many American Jews draw comparisons between Palestinian terrorists and bin Laden's network and when many Muslims blame the attacks on U.S. support for Israel, the topic of Israel seems to come up little in campus discussions.

For the most part, conversations about the war are focusing on opposition – quite common here – to the U.S. bombing of Afghanistan. However, at a recent campus peace rally, a speaker – who is Jewish – compared Zionism to racism, upsetting many Jewish students.

Muslim students, at least when interviewed by a Jewish reporter, were reluctant to broach the issue of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Several Jewish students said they generally avoid talking about Israel for fear of creating conflicts.

"I don't walk around wearing my Camp Tel Yehudah 'Property of the Zionism Department' T-shirt," said Naomi Gates-Monasch, a Jewish sophomore from the San Francisco area, referring to the camp run by the Young Judaea Zionist youth group. "That would be asking for trouble.

"In general, it's a very accepting community, but yes, obviously there are subjects we don't talk about," Gates-Monasch said.

Farrah Hamid, a Muslim freshman from New Hampshire, said Jewish and Muslim students "definitely mix," despite "some differences of opinion."

Hamid, who is of Pakistani descent, said she does not know a lot about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But when asked about the causes of the current conflict with bin Laden, she grew quiet.

"I don't want to go into it," she said.

Efraim Eisen, the Jewish chaplain at Mount Holyoke, said he hopes to increase awareness on campus about Israel's history, and is planning a teach-in about Israel.

Most students on campus "don't know a lot about the history of Israel and why it exists," he said, adding that he is concerned that anti-war sentiment on campus could lead to anti-Israel rhetoric here, as it has on some other campuses like the University of California at Berkeley.

There is also talk of creating a formal Muslim-Jewish dialogue group at Mount Holyoke, though some students are wary of the idea.

Rachel Hammerman, a sophomore from New York, said she is "kind of hesitant" about formal discussions on the Middle East.

"It's nice to talk about, but unless you really know what's going on, it's not helpful to discuss it," she said.

It is unclear whether the new dining option will attract more Muslim and Jewish students to the school. The administration says that's not the goal, but individual Muslim and Jewish students are hoping otherwise.

The Jewish community is small compared to those at other prestigious East Coast schools but is growing more active and visible – though many of the most enthusiastic participants are non-Jews exploring Judaism.

A Jewish a cappella group is starting, the school recently acquired a kosher Torah and the Jewish student group this year became affiliated with Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

However, the dining hall is unlikely to attract strict observers of either faith. The meat is not technically halal, though the Muslim community agreed to accept kosher meat, citing a Muslim tradition that kosher food is acceptable when halal is not available.

In addition, the kitchen is under Conservative, not Orthodox, rabbinic supervision. That wouldn't satisfy most Orthodox students, who are far more likely than Conservative or Reform students to choose a campus based on the availability of kosher food.

In any event, the dining hall has become popular among many students who are neither Jewish nor Muslim, partly because of its central location, and partly because of a by-product of the strict, kosher-halal demands: most of the food is freshly made. That distinguishes it from the other dining halls, which rely on pre-made, processed ingredients such as canned spaghetti sauce and powdered mashed potatoes.

Kosher Food Fest raises funds for Montreal's hungry

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Kosher Food Fest, an annual showcase of products from local caterers, hotels and food merchants, drew 1,000 patrons this year and raised about $225,000 to feed the city's poor.

The event, which has been organized by Mazon Canada for the past seven years, has grown each year.

Demand for this type of help is greater because of government cutbacks to subsidized meals, Mazon Montreal chair and Food Fest founder Dodo Heppner said.

"We could sell more tickets, but we try to be fair to the caterers who generously donate everything," Heppner said.

Founded in 1986, Mazon, which bills itself as "the Jewish response to hunger," provides money for free breakfasts and lunches for students from low-income families at several schools.

This past year, Mazon, whose motto is, "we respond to the needs of the hungry wherever and whoever they may be," made grants to close to 80 food banks, soup kitchens and other charitable organizations on a non-sectarian basis within and outside the Montreal area.

The food festival, held at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, is its major fundraiser. Its recipients range across religious, cultural and linguistic lines, including the Mission of the Great Shepherd, Tomchei Shabbos, Entraide aux Gens de la Rue, Centre Communautaire Multi-Ethnique de Montréal and Auberge Shalom Pour Femmes.

All the items up for bids in the silent auction, from paintings to fur pieces, were also donated. These savings and the fact that Mazon's Montreal office has only one staff member, help to keep the overhead for the food festival below 10 percent of the gross, Heppner said.

Volunteers are the core of the organization. This year's co-chairs were Cheryl Brott and Harriet Muroff.

This year's food festival was sold out a week ahead, with general admission tickets going for $75 a piece and special gifts categories ranging from $250 to $25,000. (Ann Loeb Bronfman of Washington, D.C., was the event's top patron, matching the $25,000 donation she made last year.)

Heppner acknowledged that some may consider an evening of over-indulgence to be an inappropriate means of raising money for those so poor they can't afford groceries.

"We have had a few people question it," Heppner said. "I had a letter from one man who organizes a number of charity golf tournaments. I asked him, 'How many of the people who you help play golf?'

Heppner defended the format.

"The fact is the end result is that we are able to pay for hundreds of thousands of meals each year," she said. "And, believe me, the need out there gets greater every year. What's wrong if people enjoy themselves at the same time?

"When I explain that to the doubters, they usually rethink it. Obviously, with the response we get, not many people feel that way."

Mazon makes on-site visits to every charity funded. What they see, said Heppner, is heart-rending and shocking. The only reason she has stayed on as Mazon chair for 14 years is that the cause is so compelling, she said.

The food festival is also an opportunity to display the variety of ways kosher food can be prepared.

Asian cuisine businesses dominated the 29 presenters this year, with Japanese sushi and more traditional Chinese fare in abundance, with the occasional Malaysian-style satay. Traiteur La Marguerite's chef made fresh sushi, and Glatt's Kosher Self-Service St. Louis offered a Chinese feast of General Tao's chicken, orange beef, dim sum, bo-bo balls and peanut dumplings.

Meanwhile, more traditional food included shwarma pitas prepared by Tradition Caterers and made-to-order sauces for pasta prepared by Etmo Catering Services.

Moishe's handed out samples of its herring, horseradish and pickles, including its new award-winning bread-and-butter variety. These are sold in selected stores and, unlike the restaurant, are kosher.

Levitt's dished up hot dogs, smoked turkey, smoked carp, hot brisket and roast beef. Not to be outdone, Ernie the Caterer toasted the ever-popular "Wilensky" deli sandwiches. Kosher Quality was a hit with its liver and onions.

Elvinco provided samples of wines, including a very potable new California zinfandel. Those abstaining could choose from Bennett's juices, including unsweetened grape juice, cranberry cocktail and peach nectar.

Heppner pointed out nothing was wasted. The leftovers were picked up for distribution among the Jewish needy, who enjoyed plentiful Shabbat dinners the next day.

Clinton to speak to ORT

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Tickets at $100 to $500 went on sale to the public this week for former U.S. president Bill Clinton's benefit lecture at Place des Arts in February. The event's organizer, ORT Montreal, is confident all 2,700 will go quickly.

Executive director Emmanuel Kalles said the Feb. 18 event is expected to gross between $850,000 and $1 million. Clinton's speaking fee has been widely reported in the American media as being between $100,000 and $150,000 US. Kalles said only that ORT is paying "closer to the lower end."

The proceeds will be shared by an ORT project in Israel under which ORT students teach computer and Internet skills to children undergoing cancer treatment in hospital, and similar projects at the Montreal Children's Hospital and Hôpital Ste. Justine.

First visit to Montreal

Tickets were made available to ORT board members prior to Jan. 7 and sold "briskly," Kalles said.

Before the lecture, Clinton will be the guest at a private dinner for 100 at the Musée d'Art Contemporain de Montréal. The ticket price is $2,500 per person for the dinner sponsored by Liberty Sites Ltd., a property development and management company, whose president and CEO is Sandra Levy.

Kalles said that if a sponsor is found for the lecture as well, revenues are expected to reach $1 million.

Clinton's speaking fee at charitable events has been the source of controversy in the past. The former president has spoken at one other fund-raiser for a Jewish charity in this country – the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem – at Toronto's 3,200-seat Hummingbird Centre last June.

Clinton's star has fallen since last June. The events of Sept. 11 and the swift progress of the Afghanistan war, with the attendant rise in President George W. Bush's popularity, have hastened Clinton's fade-out since he left office a year ago.

Kalles, however, thinks Montrealers are still interested in what he has to say. "This is the first time Clinton has ever been in Montreal... This is a unique opportunity to hear one of the most dynamic leaders of our time present his views on world events."

"This charity event will inaugurate a new relationship between ORT Montreal, the Montreal Children's Hospital and Hôpital Ste. Justine," said ORT Montreal president Arthur Silber in a press release. "Part of the evening's proceeds will go towards developing new technological programs that will improve the quality of life for children undergoing long-term care at both hospitals... A similar program in Israel will also benefit children in hospitals."

"We are excited to bring together leaders of the Montreal community, whose time is being volunteered to ensure the success of this event and to raise awareness of the educational and skills training that ORT offers people around the world."

In the Sunflowers Project, initiated by ORT Israel three years ago, trained students go into the pediatric oncology wards throughout the country to teach the young patients the technological skills they themselves are learning in ORT schools. The computers, Internet access and software are provided by ORT Israel.

At the Children's Hospital here, proceeds from the Clinton evening will fund the setting up of Starbright World™, an interactive computer network designed for hospitalized kids, chaired by film director Steven Spielberg and Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf. It will be the first hospital in Quebec to have the program, which helps patients cope with illness and its treatment. Its features include chat rooms, bulletin boards, and video conferencing that lets users thousands of miles apart see and talk to each other.

Starbright is aimed at reducing the isolation, fear and depression that sick kids experience.

At Ste. Justine, a program called Virtually Yours will be set up to prepare children and their families for hospitalization. From their homes, they can access a multi-media Web site that acquaints them with the hospital and their medical team. The program will also include setting up Internet facilities in the rooms of certain departments.

Kalles said the proceeds will probably be split almost equally, but that will depend on the beneficiaries' needs and total amount raised.

This is a new venture for ORT Montreal, whose dollars have traditionally gone directly to ORT schools in Israel, Kalles said. It is hoped that the new relationships with Montreal institutions and business leaders will make the broader community aware of what ORT is and expand the local organization's potential base of supporters.

Clinton and his wife Hillary have had another connection to ORT. In December, Hillary Clinton, now a New York senator, was honoured by American ORT for her work in education. She was presented with the first annual Ambassador David B. Hermelin Award, the organization's most prestigious citation.

Kalles said the Clintons were close friends of the late Hermelin, a past American ORT and World ORT president. Hermelin resigned the latter position when Clinton named him U.S. ambassador to Norway in 1997. He died in November 2000. However, Kalles said Clinton's acceptance to speak for ORT Montreal is "totally unrelated" to his wife's honour.

ORT Montreal approached Clinton last spring about appearing here, and he readily accepted, subject to his availability. The February date was his choice.

Steinfeld first Winnipegger to head JCC group

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Local lawyer Barry Steinfeld was elected president of the Canadian Council of Jewish Community Centres (CCJCC) and YW/YMHAs for a two-year term at the council's annual meeting in Montreal in November.

Steinfeld is the first Winnipegger to fill the position, although he notes that two former Winnipeggers play prominent roles in the organization. Jerry Zipursky is the executive director of both the national organization and the Vancouver JCC, while Avrum Namak, who used to be assistant director at the old Winnipeg Y, is an advisor to the council and the Jewish Community Centres of America (JCCA).

The council represents Canadian JCCs in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, London, Windsor, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria. Steinfeld was president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Centre in the mid-1990s during its transition from its long-time downtown location to the new Asper Jewish Community Campus, which opened in September, 1997. He has been a board member of the Canadian Council for several years.

As president of the CCJCC, Steinfeld represents the organization on the JCCA board. Paralleling Steinfeld, Hal Bordy, executive director of Winnipeg's Rady Jewish Community Centre, was re-elected president of the Canadian Region of the Association of Jewish Centre Professionals at the JCCA of North America/Association of Jewish Center Professionals annual meeting in Baltimore in early November. Bordy has also been named editor of Kesher, the association magazine.

It was a successful annual meeting for some other Rady Centre staffers as well. Tamar Barr, the Rady Centre's program director for adult services, special events, cultural arts and Judaica, was named Canadian JCC Professional of the Year, while graphic designer Gustavo Rymberg displayed his media work for the Rady Centre. His work won the JCCA North America Award for Excellence last year.

In other Rady Centre news, Bordy reports that the Winnipeg JCC has established a satellite program in Regina in conjunction with Regina's House of Jacob synagogue. "We have been working on this for six or seven months," he says. "Our program is an offshoot of the Asper Foundation's promotion of Holocaust education in smaller western Canadian centres."

The new Regina JCC is to be known as the Pearl and Max B. Herman Jewish Community Centre. It will be using the synagogue gym and social hall for its recreational programs.

"We are helping the Regina community develop a summer day camp," Bordy says. "That will be the first big program.

"We will also be reaching out to the general community with our programming since the Jewish community, with a population of about 500 to 600, is too small to support this on its own."

ABOUT PEOPLE

SCHOLARSHIP RECIPIENT

The David & Eunice Mouckley Endowment Fund, created to honour the late David Mouckley, past president of Jewish Vocational Service 1969-71, was established to support the training and education of a worthy JVS client to help them accomplish their career goals. The recipient of this year's David & Eunice Mouckley Scholarship is Elena Gurakova, a single mother of three children who immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1996 (she is originally from Russia). She is currently enrolled as a part-time student in the early childhood education program at Seneca College and supports herself working as a substitute teaching assistant at a day-care centre. Pictured below, Gurakova receives her scholarship cheque from Jeff Mouckley at the recent JVS annual general meeting.

Fulfilling the Promise.

No matter what we have done in the past today we must do more!

Since its establishment 77 years ago, Na'amat has been a security blanket for the People of Israel. Whatever and whenever there is a need you will find Na'amat on the scene. Through its extensive network of Day Care Centres, Na'amat has established a well-deserved reputation for the quality care and full education programmes extended to the pre-school age children of working parents as well as those from low income/welfare families.

1 in 5 Israeli families live below the poverty line.

Na'amat is Israel's largest source of childcare. More than 25,000 children arrive each morning in the 330 Na'amat Day Care Centres throughout Israel. In addition, there are 37 after-school programmes and 17 kindergartens.

$500 a year will give a child loving care, nourishing meals and a pre school head-start in a Na'amat Day Care Centre.

Not every teen is able to succeed in the regular school system.

For many reasons students will drop out of school, and will often find themselves on the street.

Na'amat's 14 co-educational Technological High Schools are located throughout Israel, and accommodate teens from every ethnic and social background.

$360 a year will give a teenager a second chance at an education.

Tens of thousands of Israeli teens need a refuge from problems at home...or within themselves.

Tragically, some teens can't live at home, others shouldn't. Na'amat's two Agricultural High Schools prepare these young people to go out into the world with marketable skills and academic credentials.

$600 a year will give a student the opportunity to live in one of Na'amat's residential high schools where the youth will gain security and self-esteem along with university qualifications.

Today life in Israel is being consumed by major conflicts. Israel is at the crossroads of survival. We in Canada cannot influence the results of Israel's peace negotiations nor predict her future. We can make a difference to the children who will be responsible for that future.

Any kitchen can be made kosher, rabbi says

BY MICHAEL JACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Ann Huttner has always had a kosher kitchen. She's also a vegetarian. But fiancé David Miller is a carnivore, which called for sweeping changes in their kitchen. Literally.

Huttner and Miller spent a recent Sunday in Louisville, Ky., sweeping, sponging, labelling and rearranging. The work was necessary, not only to accommodate his kitchenware, but to maintain the kosher status of the kitchen by properly separating meat and dairy, as well as dishes and containers used to serve, eat and store them.

"Luckily, we have plenty of space," Huttner said.

Space is the most pressing concern for people who want to conform to Jewish dietary laws. It's the number 1 reason to remodel a kosher kitchen.

Polly and Andrew Adler, also of Louisville, found themselves in a space quandary when they remodelled their kitchen last August.

"We just got more cabinet space; that's what we needed," Polly Adler said.

Prior to the renovation, she had to store all their meat dishes in the hall and laundry closets.

"It's still not big enough to keep everything in there," she said. "I still have to keep my meat silverware and some other items in the china cabinet."

Once space needs have been taken care of, the next thing to consider is appliances.

Some people who are stricter in their observance have two sets of appliances such as dishwashers. They also wash dairy and meat dishes in separate sinks and put them on separate counters.

It's not necessary to have two stove tops because they use a direct flame and are much easier to kosher, said Rabbi Avrohom Litvin of Louisville's Congregation Anshei Sfard.

"Therefore, the same stove is most often used for both," Rabbi Litzin said.

If you're thinking that redecorating to be kosher can cost a bundle, you're right.

"It's expensive," Adler admitted.

The Adlers use only one dishwasher, but just for dairy. They would have used it for both had the racks inside been made of stainless steel. They didn't feel the porous plastic met their requirements for materials that could be neutralized by heat. Unfortunately, that means hand washing all the meat dishes. Or using disposables.

"Hand washing the dishes is a little bit tedious, especially when you have two kids," said Adler, who recently gave birth to her second child. "So we end up using a lot of paper and plastic, which is not great for the environment, but it's good for mommy, because mommy doesn't have to hand wash the dishes."

They also use one oven. The new unit is self-cleaning, and the extremely high temperature of the self-cleaning cycle makes it easier for her to kosher the oven for Passover.

It may sound like a lot of work, but people who keep kosher say they enjoy many benefits.

"It's a spiritual thing," Adler said. "It's an act of faith you take because you feel strongly about being a part of the Jewish community, and it makes you a part of the Jewish community in a way that we felt was important to us.

"It brings God into it in a way that wouldn't be there if you didn't have to think about everything you put in your mouth," she added.

There's also a practical element when living in a Jewish community.

In order to fulfil the mitzvah of hospitality and to entertain friends and family, Weissbach "didn't want any Jew to have to say to us, 'I can't eat in your house.'

"But at least we wanted to give them a fighting chance," he said, laughing.

You might think from all this that keeping kosher is too hard, but it's not.

"Basically, any kitchen can be made kosher," Rabbi Litvin said, "and kosher can be made in just about any kitchen."

Adler agrees. "It's not difficult once it's installed," she said. "Once it's done, it's just automatic, you don't think about it."

"It feels good," Weissbach said simply, adding, "Our culture has kept kosher for about 3,000 years; we don't really have the right to stop."

CJ Food

Vegetarians can enjoy pareve recipes too

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Eileen Goltz, a U.S. caterer, food writer and cooking teacher, got her love of cooking genetically.

"I've been cooking since I was old enough to hold on to a spoon. My sister and I were the chopped liver grinders and gefilte fish choppers from a very early age," says Goltz, author of the recently released Perfectly Pareve and a freelance food writer for The CJN.

"There is an old joke about the Jewish holidays, she says. "It's either feasting or fasting, but either way it's all about food.

"Jews around the world seem to end up at a meal at some time during any holiday. I would say that next to praying and studying together, eating together as a family or community is one of the strongest ties that bind us together," she says.

Goltz graduated from the Cordon Bleu Cooking School in Paris, France, where her teachers "were big on classic French cooking.

"Nouveau cuisine had yet to be invented and everything was about cream, butter and eggs. They felt that once everyone in the class had mastered the basics, we would be able to create, invent and explore any avenue of taste that intrigued us. What I wanted was to create great kosher recipes."

Her catering business began by accident, she says, when she moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., about 24 years ago.

"I started helping friends and family plan for bar mitzvahs and weddings, and eventually I was asked to cater a private party. It grew from there.

"I often cater kosher events for corporations that have several executives who require kosher meals. They prefer that the entire event be kosher, so everyone is served the same meal," she says.

A confessed chocoholic, Goltz also "adores cookies and bread, and don't forget French fries and portabello mushrooms and...

"I love to bake, but not bread. A very poorly kept secret is that no one ever wants me to bake challah. I can never make it come out right, no matter whose recipe I try."

The idea for a cookbook, which she began writing about seven years ago, came about when she began searching for pareve recipes for a catered wedding.

"I realized that I had collected some great recipes that anyone could use. I knew my vegetarian friends would love them."

She shares the following recipes:

WILD RICE SOUP

This is a nice twist on an old classic. You can add exotic mushrooms and give it an unusual flavour.

1 lb. halved or quartered mushrooms
4 medium potatoes, cubed
2 chopped onions
1/3 cup shredded carrots
1 tbsp. dried parsley
8-10 cups vegetable broth

In a large pot, combine all the ingredients. Mix well. Bring to a boil. Reduce flame and cover. Simmer 40-60 minutes. Makes 8-10 servings.

BEEFLESS STEW

This is a hearty, full-bodied stew.

2 tsp. olive oil
2-3 crushed garlic cloves
15 small boiling onions cut in half lengthwise
1 lb. peeled baby carrots
1 cup celery cut into 1-in. chunks
3 medium potatoes peeled and cut into 1-in. cubes
1 cup frozen peas
1 cup frozen corn
1 cup tomato sauce
1/4 to 1/3 cup onion soup mix
1 cup water
1/2 cup red wine
1 tsp. thyme
1 bay leaf
8 oz. extra firm tofu cut into 1-in. cubes
1/2 tsp. black pepper, freshly ground
3 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1/4 cup water

Heat oil in a large, heavy saucepan over a medium heat. Add the garlic, onions, baby carrots, celery and potatoes. Cook for 10 minutes, stirring frequently. Add the remaining ingredients except the flour and 1/4 cup water. If necessary, add extra water so that all the ingredients are covered. Cover, reduce heat and simmer for about 30 minutes or until potatoes are tender, stirring occasionally.

In a small bowl, mix flour with the 1/4 cup water until smooth. Add to the stew, stirring constantly until the liquid of the stew thickens. Remove and discard bay leaf before serving. Serve over rice or noodles. Makes 6-8 servings.

BEANS AND CORN SAUTE

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 medium onion, diced
2 cups cooked lima beans
2 cups fresh string beans steamed
1 cup chopped, seeded tomatoes
1/2 cup whole kernel corn
1/2 tsp. paprika
dash cayenne pepper
2 1/2 tsp. salt (optional)

In a large skillet, heat the oil and saute the onion until golden brown. Add the other ingredients and toss well until thoroughly heated, about 5 minutes. Remove from the heat and serve immediately. You can double or triple this recipe. Makes 4 servings.

OATMEAL DATE BARS

Filling:
2 cups chopped dates
grated rind of 1/2 orange
1/4 cup cold water
2 tbsp. orange juice
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. lemon juice

Crust:
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup soft margarine
1 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1 1/2 cups oats

Make filling first. In a medium saucepan, combine the dates, water, orange rind and brown sugar. Cook over medium heat until thick and smooth, stirring constantly. Remove from heat and add fruit juices. Mix well and set aside to let cool. It must be cool before you spread it.

Preheat oven to 325. In a bowl, combine the flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Add the margarine and mix it in with a fork or in a food processor.

Add the brown sugar and oats. Mix well (with fork or food processor). Spread half the crumbs in a greased shallow 9 x 13-in. pan and pat to smooth.

Cover with cooled filling, spreading evenly and then layer the remaining crumbs on top. Pat smooth. Bake for 30-35 minutes. Increase heat to 350 for an additional 5 minutes to lightly brown the top. Cut into squares while hot and allow the bars to cool in the pan. Makes 32 squares.

Zinni sees a 'real' chance for progress

By ALUF BENN and DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. Middle East envoy Anthony Zinni summed up his recent visit to the region, saying that alongside serious challenges, it is clear that there are real opportunities for progress.

Zinni, who completed his visit Sunday and returned to Washington, will return to the region on Jan. 18 for another round of talks to assess each side's readiness for the implementation of the Tenet report.

Zinni convened the joint Israeli-Palestinian security meeting Sunday and proposed the implementation of a plan that involves mutual steps to attain a cease-fire, as agreed upon in a meeting between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat in late September.

Zinni described the meeting as "positive and constructive." He asked the Israelis and Palestinians to continue the security meetings with or without an American presence, in order to formulate practical steps to increase security co-operation and to plan the implementation of the Tenet report "at the right time."

Zinni told Arafat on Saturday that he must not only reduce the number of terror attacks, but must also take measures against the terror infrastructure, and that almost nothing has yet been done in this area. According to Zinni, the PA must deal with the "ideological basis" of the terror organizations, their commanders and the types of weapons they use.

"Every time I come to the region, Israel makes a gesture; it's time you also made a gesture," Zinni said to Arafat regarding Palestinian efforts to arm themselves.

In meetings Sunday with Peres and Israel President Moshe Katsav, Zinni asked Israel to continue to ease restrictions on the Palestinian population in the territories. It is important, he said, that economic measures accompany the security measures, and that this would facilitate the implementation of the Tenet report. Zinni told Katsav that the easing of restrictions helped considerably to improve the atmosphere and serves as a positive sign, especially to the Palestinian population, which is looking for a ray of light for the future. But, Zinni added, Israel must show further signs of goodwill – for example, allowing the transfer of vegetables from Jericho to Ramallah.

Zinni did not comment on Israel's seizure of the arms ship Karine A. He rejected a request from senior PA officials to set up a three-way Israel-Palestinian-American investigation to look into the affair. The matter must be dealt with directly by the Israelis and the Palestinians, without American intervention, Zinni said. But, he said, the seizure of the arms ship should not interfere with continued efforts to create conditions for the implementation of the Tenet report and a cease-fire.

Zinni did not say how many days a cease-fire would have to be maintained before the plan could be implemented. But he emphasized that the continued reduction in the level of terror and the normalization of life in the West Bank and Gaza should be viewed as a process leading to implementation of the Tenet report.

The capture took months to plan

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Staff

EILAT — The capture of the ship Karine A took only a short time, but it was months in the planning.

It essentially began several months ago, when naval intelligence discovered that the Palestinian Authority (PA) had secretly purchased a 4,000-ton cargo ship. The IDF promptly began monitoring the ship's activities, and it soon discovered that the vessel was being operated by some of the same people involved in the PA's failed attempt to smuggle arms from Lebanon to Gaza by sea six months ago.

A few weeks ago, the ship, which sailed under the flag of Tonga, reached the Persian Gulf and anchored off the Iranian isle of Kish, north of Dubai. There it took on its cargo of weapons. It then stopped in Yemen, where crew members said it was supposed to take on more arms, but for some reason did not. It was then supposed to traverse the Red Sea, go through the Suez Canal, unload its cargo off the Gazan coast and then proceed to Bulgaria for repairs.

Three weeks ago, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon approved the interception operation – dubbed Operation Noah's Ark – during a nighttime visit to his residence in Jerusalem by the IDF's top brass. The time and place for this meeting were chosen to avoid attracting attention that could compromise the operation. Defense Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer also approved the plan.

The IDF decided to perform the interception in the Red Sea, in international waters located between Sudan and Saudi Arabia, in order to avoid conducting it off the Egyptian coast – which would risk both a political crisis with Egypt and interference by the Egyptian fleet. Army sources said this distance to the target was the one real difficulty in the operation, as it necessitated large air forces, including midair refueling.

The operation formally began early last week, when naval boats set off for the Red Sea from Eilat, carrying the naval commandos who would comprise the actual boarding party. Then, a few hours before the planned interception, the airborne forces – comprising fighter planes, combat helicopters, spy planes and midair refueling jets – took off from Israel.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz cancelled a planned trip to Washington at the last minute last week in order to oversee the operation from an airborne command post, along with the commanders-in-chief of the navy and air force, Maj.-Gens. Yedidia Ya'ari and Dan Halutz.

The actual operation took place early last Thursday morning, after last-minute photographs from one of the spy planes confirmed that this was indeed the Karine A. But it lasted only moments, as the boarding party encountered no resistance from the crew. Only three crew members were even awake, and not a shot was fired on either side.

Shin Bet investigators promptly began interrogating the crew, while Israeli sailors put the ship on course for Eilat. It arrived last Friday afternoon, and the unloading of its cargo began.

TRAVEL Israel

A Land Beyond Description

Welcome to Travel Israel, our new weekly feature on one of the world's most magnificent countries.

She is fifty times smaller than Ontario. Barely a dot on a worldwide map. But Israel is more than the headlines surrounding her name, more emotionally powerful than any destination on earth. Israel houses the Jewish soul. From Metulla to Eilat, from the Mediterranean coast to the Jordan River Valley, visiting Israel is an inspiring experience.

Israel is easy to reach and only half a day away primarily via El Al or Air Canada, which offer direct and non-stop flights from Toronto. Consult your travel agent for the best airline schedule and fares to suit your needs. Once in Israel, both car rentals and all-inclusive, secure pre-packaged bus tours by companies such as Egged (www.eggedtours.co.il) are plentiful.

And speaking of tours, many Jewish organizations conduct well-priced, popular, packaged missions to Israel. Contact us at the Israel Government Tourist Office for more information.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce
The Sixth Annual
Passover Literary Supplement.

We invite the authors and poets among our readers to submit their works. The works must be previously unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction cannot be longer than 1,500 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than Feb. 15, 2002
Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our seventh annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 21. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 2002. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 8, 2002.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 21, 2002.

Saudis help Hamas with rocket project

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas operatives in Saudi Arabia have been sending money, instructions and information to their colleagues in Gaza for their Kassam rocket-development project, the Shin Bet security service has revealed.

The information was elicited from a liaison between the two groups who was recently arrested and interrogated.

The Kassam, developed to provide a longer-range alternative to mortar shells, was fired in Gaza for the first time three months ago. Since then, Hamas has used it against Israeli settlements at least 10 times. It carries a one-kilogram warhead and has a range of 1.5 to three kilometres.

However, Israel has learned that an improved version, with a range of up to five kilometres, is already in the advanced stages of development. Fired from the Gaza Strip, such a rocket could reach the southern suburbs of Ashkelon.

Defence sources said that Hamas is trying to develop a threat against southern towns, similar to what Hezbollah achieved in the north with the use of its Katyusha rockets.

The Hamas liaison with Saudi Arabia, Osama Zuhari Hamad Krika'a, is a 27-year-old resident of Gaza City. He was arrested at the Rafah border crossing on Dec. 18, while en route to Saudi Arabia.

Krika'a told his interrogators that he had joined Hamas last August and had been sent to Saudi Arabia for the first time in September. The cover for his trip was a pilgrimage to Mecca. While there, he delivered messages to local Hamas activists and was given money to bring back to Gaza.

In December, Krika'a was asked to go to Saudi Arabia again, using the cover story of a medical problem that required special treatment. But he was arrested by the Shin Bet, which found large quantities of information about the Kassam project on his person.

Krika'a told his interrogators that once the rocket was operational, instructions for making it would have been transferred to Hamas cells on the West Bank so that cities in central Israel could also be threatened. The West Bank's "arms industry" is considered less sophisticated than Gaza's.

One of the project's co-ordinators was Adnan al-Rul, who is also high on Israel's wanted list. Al-Rul is considered an expert in preparing weapons, including rockets, mortars and bombs. Another key figure is Nidal Frihat, who recruited Krika'a. Shin Bet officials said that Israel had asked the Palestinian Authority to arrest Frihat several times, but it had not done so.

This is not the first time information and money has been smuggled to terrorist groups in the territories from Arab states. Hamas has frequently received assistance in upgrading its weapons from graduates of engineering colleges in these states.

Israel asks U.S. to strike western Iraq first if it fights Saddam

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer paid a visit to the secretive Ness Ziona Biological Institute last week.

It appears one of the main subjects of the briefing was the concern about a possible attack by Iraq, with unconventional payloads delivered by either missiles or planes.

According to security sources participating in Israeli preparations for a possible American move on Iraq, any decision by U.S. President George W. Bush makes about when to attack Iraq depends on three main elements: building the case against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, including charges and evidence; identifying an alternative ruler; and building up the forces that will execute the attack.

The defence establishment here believes the Bush administration has given up trying to find an Iraqi version of Afghanistan's Northern Alliance. Instead, Washington is studying intelligence profiles of top Iraqi army commanders who could take control in Baghdad concurrent with or immediately after the start of an American campaign.

In a U.S. attack, Saddam won't hurry to attack Israel, say defence sources, because, among other reasons, he won't want to expose the weaponry that he managed to hide – and deny he had hidden – over the past decade.

Unlike the spring of 1990, when Saddam was already threatening to "burn half of Israel" (before he invaded Kuwait) if attacked, no such threats toward Israel have been coming out of Baghdad, the sources say.

But if Saddam concludes that the Americans are about to topple him, he'll try to attack Israel with a barrage of missiles or airplanes. Topping Israel's worries are a possible ground-to-ground missile attack, with chemical or biological payloads.

The defence establishment believes that much lower on the list of possibilities is Iraq sending pilots on suicide missions, whether to drop non-conventional payloads, or to crash their planes. The loyalty of Iraqi pilots to Saddam, and their readiness to die for him while his regime is crumbling, is not a certainty.

In contacts between Israeli and American defence officials over the past few weeks, Pentagon representatives were asked to plan their operations in Iraq in such a way as to minimize the Iraqi ability to move missile launchers into western Iraq, from which missiles can reach Israel. The Americans were told that Israel expects them to conduct operations, including on the ground, in western Iraq from the start of a campaign, and not to wait until Iraq starts launching missile attacks on Israel, as happened in 1991. Israeli officials say they believe the Pentagon will accede to this request.

The Pentagon, meanwhile, is very interested in the technologies, weapons systems and military doctrines that have been developed in Israel over the past few years. Israeli defence officials and representatives, led by Defence Ministry Director-General Amos Yaron, and including head of weapons development and technology infrastructure Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Ben-Israel, met with American officials in Washington and showed videos demonstrating examples of Israel's policy of "pinpoint targeting" in the West Bank and Gaza. The emphasis was on combat helicopter attacks that caused no collateral damage to anything other than the target, even if civilians were in the area.

American air force and special operations officers visited Israel to learn about pinpoint targeting from Israel Defence Forces special operations commanders. The Americans were offered Israeli assistance in many areas, including inoculations against anthrax.

"Arafat chooses to purchase long-range Katyushas instead of education for the children. Arafat chooses to purchase mortars instead of investing the money in creating jobs. Arafat chooses to invest tens of millions of dollars in missiles, mines and rifles, instead of investing them in the welfare of his people."

IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said the vessel was supposed to make another stop before it was to land in the Gaza Strip, but he did not specify the location. He said that upon arrival the weapons would have been transported from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank.

The American navy attache, Roger Bass, who was in Eilat, said that he was under the impression that the weapons cargo was intended for the PA.

Top political advisor to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Osama al-Baz, said Sunday in Cairo that if it was proven the Palestinian Authority was behind the smuggling attempt, then it was a serious blow to the peace process.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Recalled on Dec. 16 after failing to persuade the Palestinians and Israel to abide by a formal ceasefire, Anthony Zinni, the U.S. special envoy to the Mideast, returned to the region last week for another round of peacemaking.

His goals were two-fold: to urge the Palestinian Authority (PA) to take stronger steps against homegrown terrorism and to convince Israel to ease its maze of security restrictions on the Palestinians.

Mideast Analysis

Zinni spent three weeks in Israel and the Palestinian autonomous areas in November and December, hoping to enlist both sides to observe the Tenet understandings. He failed miserably. More than 40 Israelis were killed during his mission, ostensibly designed to defuse the 15-month-old intifadah.

Last June, George Tenet, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, worked out an agreement specifying how Israel and the PA could reach a ceasefire and begin implementing the Mitchell report, released on April 30.

Under the Mitchell framework, named after retired U.S. senator George Mitchell, a truce would be followed by cooling off and confidence-building periods, then by a resumption of bilateral talks. Israel broke off final-status negotiations with the PA last January, on the eve of its general election.

When Zinni arrived in Jerusalem on Nov. 26, the area was boiling over. Israel had just hunted down and killed Mahmoud Abu Hanoud, a Hamas military leader in the West Bank, and the Palestinians had retaliated by shelling Jewish settlements and Israeli army outposts in the Gaza Strip. In one mortar barrage on Nov. 25, an Israeli reservist was hit, the first fatality of its kind since the outbreak of the uprising.

Immediately after Zinni's arrival, five Palestinian boys set off an Israeli booby-trap in Gaza with fatal consequences, and Hamas gunmen murdered two Israeli civilians in Afula. On the day Zinni met PA Chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza, an Israeli women was slain in an ambush near Gush Katif. Zinni called for an end to the violence – Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon insists on a week of complete calm before the Tenet plan kicks in – but on Dec. 1 and 2, Hamas suicide bombers detonated bombs in Jerusalem and Haifa, killing 26 civilians. Shortly afterward, an Israeli nuclear researcher was cut down in Gaza.

After blaming Arafat for the bombings, Sharon went on the offensive. Israel destroyed Arafat's fleet of helicopters, plowed up Gaza airport's runway, bombed PA facilities, tightened the existing closure and besieged Nablus and Ramallah. Subsequently, the Israeli cabinet declared the PA "an entity that supports terrorism."

Pounded by Israel, and relentlessly pressured by the United States, the European Union and the United Nations, Arafat placed Ahmed Yassin, Hamas' spiritual leader, under house arrest. Arafat also began arresting Hamas and Islamic Jihad functionaries and closing their offices. These developments led to serious intra-Palestinian clashes. Claiming that Arafat was still holding back, Sharon ordered F-16s to bomb a Gaza mortar factory.

On Dec. 13, Hamas terrorists killed 10 Israeli Jews in a bus ambush near the West Bank settlement of Emmanuel, bringing to 242 the number of Israelis who have died in the intifadah. Sharon broke all contacts with Arafat, declaring him "irrelevant." When Israel bombed PA buildings and bases, the PA described these attacks as a "declaration of war." Rendered redundant by the surging spiral of violence, Zinni left the region in despair.

In the aftermath of U.S. President George W. Bush's suggestion that Arafat had not cracked down sufficiently hard on terrorism and its infrastructure, Arafat, in Arabic, demanded a complete halt to all armed attacks and suicide bombings. Hamas, reluctantly, agreed to a truce, but not in the territories.

Since then, the level of violence has subsided significantly, and not a single Israeli has been killed by Palestinian fire. (By contrast, 14 Palestinians have been killed in Israeli anti-terror operations.) But the intifadah simmers on, with daily shooting and bombing incidents.

Zinni has his work cut out for him.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 31

• The government announced a campaign to expel illegal foreign workers. Special teams of police and inspectors are aiming to deport 1,000 to 3,000 illegal workers a month.

Jan. 1

• Approximately 300 Jewish students from Argentina, ages 18 to 26, arrived on a 10-day visit under the auspices of the Taglit organization and the Jewish Agency. An additional 200 students are expected to arrive next month.

Jan. 2

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met with Norwegian Foreign Minister Jan Petersen, telling him that Israel would not conduct diplomatic negotiations under fire. Sharon also told Peterson that the decline in the recent number of terrorist incidents stems from Israel's counter-terrorist operations and international pressure on Palestinan Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Jan. 3

• Egypt began broadcasting Hebrew-language television news programs to Israel.

• The IDF withdrew from Jenin, Nablus and Ramallah. A blockade was also lifted around Hebron and Kalkilya.

• U.S. envoy to the Middle East Anthony Zinni suggested in a meeting with the heads of the Israeli security branches that Israel give up on the demand of seven days of quiet before negotiations can begin anew under the Tenet Document.

Jan. 4

Israel falls out of the headlines

According to Reports

The most interesting fact about Canadian media coverage of Israel around New Year's was its near absence. Why is it noteworthy when Israel, even for a short period, is not deemed all that newsworthy? One answer is that it allows us an opportunity to see Israel and Israeli-Palestinian relations in a global context where the attention is proportionate.

It is not that there has been no news from Israel; indeed, while there has been a drop in violence since Arafat's Dec. 16 call for an end to suicide attacks, there have been violent incidents – albeit, relatively minor ones – almost daily. It is rather that other events around the world have been more newsworthy: the alarming rise in Indian-Pakistani tensions following the suicide terrorist attack on the Indian parliament by Pakistan-based militants; the Argentinian economic meltdown and related political instability; the raging fires in Australia; the continuing hunt for Mullah Omar in Afghanistan, and for Osama bin Laden; even the introduction of Euro bank notes.

Compared to these events, the continuing but distinctly lower-level violence in the West Bank and Gaza – and the absence of any suicide bombing – bumped Israel from the headlines for days. How long will attention to other global issues last? To take one case, New York Times columnist Paul Krugman opened his Jan. 1 article on Argentina on this ironic note: "Although images of the riots in Argentina have flickered across our television screens, hardly anyone in the U.S. cares. It's just another disaster in a small, faraway country of which we know nothing – a country as remote and unlikely to affect our lives as, say, Afghanistan."

If Americans hardly care about Argentina, is it any different for Canadians? For that matter how much do they really care about Israel and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict? According to a Leger poll conducted in early December, 80 percent of Canadians said they follow the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with 35 percent saying they follow it regularly and 42 percent saying they follow it occasionally. Only 21 percent said they never follow it.

The interesting question is whether eight out of 10 Canadians follow the conflict because of the prominent , and perennial, media attention or whether the media attention reflects inherent Canadian interest. It would also be of interest to learn how Canadian interest in Israeli-Palestinian affairs compares with interest in other regions of the world.

Furthermore, this level of interest must also be considered in light of a Maclean's/CBC year-end poll that found that Canadians are overwhelmingly concerned with health, education and economic issues and that foreign affairs issues rank low on their list of priorities.

Storm among South African Jews

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN, S.A. — A South African Jewish politician has caused a storm in the community by calling for Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza Strip and disparaging Jews who disagree with him.

At a public meeting Dec. 7, cabinet minister Ronnie Kasrils launched a petition calling for people "of Jewish descent" to support "justice for Palestine."

Kasrils addressed a group of about 50 supporters under the banner Not In My Name at the District Six Museum, which is named for an area subjected to forced removals under the apartheid government. He lashed out at those in the Jewish community who had been critical of his stance, labelling them "conservative" and "reactionary."

"The declaration is hardly a radical position, it's a universally adopted one," he said. "Our argument is not dealt with by our detractors in South Africa, not even by the learned rabbis of the beit din [rabbinical court].

"Instead they denounce us in terms of personal vilification."

Kasrils' call, which attempts to link the suffering of the Palestinians to the treatment of black South Africans under apartheid, is creating rifts in what is normally a united Jewish community.

Mervyn Smith, immediate past president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, said he has no problem with the issue being aired publicly, and believes the controversy has united the community in opposition to Kasrils and his cause.

"I just question why, of all the issues that face South Africa, such massive public prevalence should be given in the media to the South African Jewish attitude toward the Middle East conflict," Smith said. "The publicity has been relentlessly driven by Kasrils."

Responding to the criticisms, Kasrils said at the rally, "The honest and critical debate which was once the hallmark of this Jewish community has withered away under the stifling leadership of conservatives and reactionaries.

"We're neither anti-Israeli nor anti-Jewish. We call for justice and fairness for both" Israelis and Palestinians, Kasrils said. "We unreservedly condemn terrorism in all its forms, whether by the Israeli government [or] Palestinian suicide bombers."

Kasrils drew a parallel between his supporters and Jews who had participated in the struggle against apartheid.

"We may be a minority at present, but change is often started thus: South African history is proof of that," Kasrils said. "The very tiny fraction of us who stood up" in the anti-apartheid struggle "well know how we were shunned by our Jewish community."

Smith, however, expressed cynicism about Kasrils' motives. "What he has done is linked his current campaign simplistically to his years as an apartheid fighter, but the two issues are separate," Smith said. "There's little doubt in the community that it is an overt attempt to gain support among the Muslim community for Kasrils and his party."

In addition, Smith said, Kasrils has misrepresented the Jewish community's position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"It is preposterous to suggest that the Jewish community is against dialogue and debate on the Middle East issue," Smith said. "Many South African Jews are not happy with some of the policies of the current government of Israel, but it is a far cry from criticizing those policies to declaring oneself hostile and anti-Zionist, as Kasrils has done."

At last month's meeting, however, it appeared that at least some in the Jewish community support Kasrils. Messages of support came from Physicians for Human Rights in Israel and Israeli groups such as Gush Shalom and the Israeli Committee Against Housing Demolitions.

In a follow-up move, Kasrils organized countrywide demonstrations on Dec. 28 in solidarity with Women in Black, an Israeli group that says Israeli-Palestinian violence is caused by Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Meanwhile, the debate continues in the op-ed pages of the mainstream and Jewish press, anathema to a community who until now presented a united face.

Despite the uproar, Smith does not think the incident will change South African Jewry.

"I feel that the effect of the Kasrils campaign has been to unite the community in the face of unfair and blatantly hostile attacks on Israel, and on the community itself," he said.

What's New in medicine and health

The following is a selection of brief notes on what's new in medicine and health.

New Drug Therapy for Crohn's

Remicade (infliximab), a new drug for the treatment of Crohn's disease, has been approved by Health Canada.

Double-blind, placebo-controlled trials have shown Remicade to be both safe and effective in treating adult patients who have severe Crohn's disease which has not responded to conventional treatment. It is one of a new class of drugs, called monoclonal antibodies, that have been shown to have excellent potential as drug treatments.

Remicade is given intravenously over a period of two to three hours, once for those with severe, active Crohn's, and three times in those with fistulas. Patients typically see relief within two to six weeks after treatment begins.

Although there are some side effects, including upper respiratory tract infection, headache, nausea, sinusitis, rash and cough, it does not appear to interact with any foods, beverages or other drugs.

Crohn's is a form of inflammatory bowel disease (IBD), in which the gastrointestinal tract becomes inflamed, forms sores, bleeds easily and loses the normal smoothness of its inner lining. If the inflammation penetrates into nearby organs, such as the bladder or vagina, some people develop fistulas, open channels from the bowel wall to the skin or nearby organs, through which fecal matter can drain. These fistulas can cause pockets of infection, which must often be treated surgically.

The cause is unknown, although there is a theory that it is an auto-immune disease.

Cardiac Rehab Program

St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital is offering a six month outpatient program for those with heart disease. It is one of eight new provincial sites providing outpatient cardiac rehabilitation as part of a ministry of health and long-term care pilot project to provide Toronto area residents with better access to treatment for heart disease.

Program physician Murray Waldman says in a media release that the program's goal will be to "help patients prevent the progression of coronary heart disease and help them achieve active, healthy lives."

The program includes supervised exercise; nutritional, psychological and medication counselling; and classes to stop smoking and develop a healthy lifestyle. You are eligible if you have had a recent transplant, heart attack, angioplasty, post-valve replacement, bypass surgery, congestive heart failure or angina. A referral from your family doctor or specialist is necessary. For more information, call the Cardiac Outpatient Rehabilitation Program, 416-224-6953.

Cloning Update

The controversy continues over the report by scientists at Advanced Cell Technology, a Massachusetts biotechnology company, that has cloned human embryos.

Although the original claim was that the research was purely for therapeutic purposes – that is, to generate cells identical to a particular patient's that can be used to treat disease – Scientific American magazine reports that several groups have indicated that they are considering reproductive cloning. Creating babies, in other words.

The United States, Canada, and Great Britain, among other countries, are working on legislation to ban reproductive cloning.

Rabbi David Schochet, president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, told The CJN that while therapeutic cloning was perfectly acceptable to Jewish law, reproductive cloning is contrary to Jewish law.

Iron supplements for children

Stanley Zlotkin, head of the division of gastroenterology and nutrition at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, has been given a three year, $1.2 million grant from the H.J. Heinz Company to support his research into iron supplements for infants, particularly in the developing world.

Zlotkin has developed Supplefer Sprinkles, an iron supplement in the form of tasteless powder granules that can be sprinkled on any food. Currently used treatments, such as iron drops, are considerably more expensive, often have an undesirable taste, and also stain teeth.

Susie Johnson, who presented the award to Zlotkin on behalf of Heinz, described his work as "a major breakthrough in the battle against global childhood anemia due to iron deficiency, a condition that harms fetal health and impairs mental development. More than 30 percent of the world's population are iron deficient."

Zlotkin also received the company's first humanitarian award.

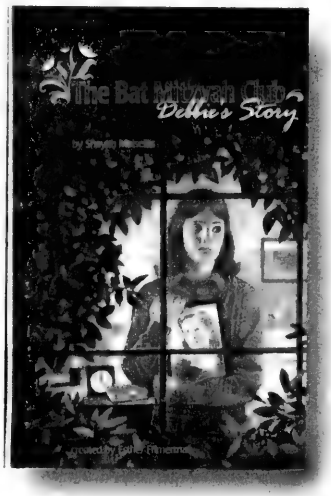
Join the Bat Mitzvah Club

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Preparing for your bar or bat mitzvah celebration can seem like an overwhelming task. Besides having to read from the Torah, for those who do, there is also the speech in front of a crowd of family and friends, and meeting lots and lots of people. It is also the time you become an adult, Jewishly speaking, and are responsible for your own mitzvot.

Sometimes it seems as if a boy's bar mitzvah is more important, but that is not true. Both the bar and bat mitzvah are equally important stages on one's life.

Debbie Solomon, the heroine of The Bat Mitzvah Club: Debbie's story, by Shayna Meiseles (Merkos L'Inyonei Chinuch, 2001) is 11 years old, just months away from becoming bat mitzvah. And she is not happy about it.



Her family has just transferred her and her little sister, Miri, from a public school to a Jewish day school. That isn't so bad, because she catches up with her class very quickly, is doing well in school (except for math!), and has made some really good friends, especially Leah.

She is also one of the best swimmers on the swim team and is hoping to compete in the junior finals.

Everything would be fine, except that her parents keep trying to talk about her bat mitzvah. When she thinks about it, all that comes to mind is Leah's brother David's bar mitzvah, which was a very lavish affair. Besides, she would have to make a speech in front of a whole bunch of guests, and that is very scary.

Just to make matters worse, her parents enroll her in the Bat Mitzvah Club, an after-school program for girls her age. She is not pleased about this – not only will she have to think about becoming bat mitzvah, but it will make her late for swim practice.

When she gets to the club, she is pleasantly surprised. Several of her classmates are there, including Leah, and the teacher, Mrs. Levy, seems to be very nice and makes the class interesting.

As time goes by, the girls discuss what it means to be a bat mitzvah and what it means to be Jewish, and especially a Jewish woman. Debbie had never thought about that much.

Mrs. Levy's describes the bat mitzvah as "the time when your godly soul becomes complete... It's like your soul has been waiting all this time to really show itself and now it saturates you like... water fills a sponge." It was something Debbie had not recognized.

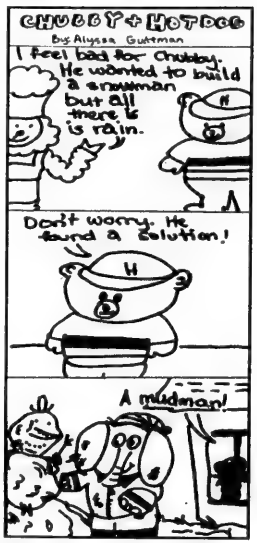
Each girl is given a journal to write their thoughts in, and Debbie finds that she can sometimes express her feelings better in writing than she can to people.

Debbie has to decide what kind of person she wants to be. She doesn't have to go along with the rather harebrained ideas Leah has, and she is entitled to have other friends besides her and make her own decisions. She also realizes that although her little sister can be a pest, she is still her sister.

As Mrs. Levy explains, bat mitzvah is "the time to start training yourself to check in with your mind before you go along with your heart."

When her family realizes how grown up she is becoming, she is let in on a family secret. Her beloved grandmother had an older sister, named Esther. When World War II began, Esther left home and joined the resistance. She was never seen again. The family had tried for many years to find Esther, but finally gave up.

For a school project, Debbie decided to find Esther, a task that would take a lot of time, a lot of work, and a lot of hoping and dreaming.



CHUBBY + HOTDOG
By Alyssa Guttman
I feel bad for Chubby. He wanted to build a snowman but all there is is rain.
Don't worry. He found a solution!
A mudman!

It meant a lot to her grandmother and her parents that she was trying so hard to unite the family.

When her bat mitzvah came, there was no ice sculpture or big show, just an elegant luncheon, with lots of flowers, close friends and family, and a wonderful surprise.

The Bat Mitzvah Club: Debbie's story is one of a series of books created by Esther Frimerman. You can find it, and other books in the series, at Jewish book stores.

Eggs for Breakfast?

Rabbi and Mrs. Chanina ben Dosa always did what was right, sometimes with unexpected results. In this story adapted from the Gemarah, they do the mitzvah of hashavat aveida (returning lost objects).

Rabbi Chanina ben Dosa was very poor, like most talmudic scholars of his era, and ours as well. One morning, as his wife was sweeping the front yard of their cottage, she noticed a hen and a rooster tied together by their scrawny legs. She looked around. Whose chickens were these? She wondered who had lost them.

When her husband returned from the Beit Midrash (study hall), she showed him the chickens.

"Hmmm..." he said, inspecting them. "We have to announce our find. Put up signs reading: 'Found: Chickens. If they are yours, please come to Rabbi Chanina ben Dosa and identify them.' Well, dear. bring them in. We'll be having scrambled eggs for breakfast tomorrow!"

"We can't cook their eggs!" exclaimed his wife. "We'd be stealing from the owners. After all, if the eggs hatch, the chicks would belong to whoever lost the chickens. We've just got to let them hatch."

And hatch they did. Soon their tiny cottage was full of squawking, hopping, hungry chickens, which gobbled up the feed that Rabbi Chanina bought for them.

"Enough!" his wife finally pleaded. "All these chickens will eat us out of house and home! And the owner hasn't shown up yet. It's been months already!"

Rabbi Chanina agreed. He scooped the chickens into a large crate, and shlepped it to the marketplace. "Chickens! Chickens! Does anybody want to buy delicious, nutritious chickens? Fresh, healthy, and tasty! Enough to feed your family for half a year!"

"Chickens, eh?" inquired an old man leading some goats to a fountain. "You want to sell 'em?"

"Yes."

"Hmmm... I'll give you a hundred... oh, I left my money belt at home.... Ah, we could use some chickens, the wife and me. Hey, want to trade 'em? I'll give you these goats for 'em."

"Sure!" agreed Rabbi Chanina, relieved that now he would have something easier to take care of. He returned home with the goats, and built a small enclosure for them. They also began to multiply, until he had a full-sized goat farm on his hands.

Years passed. One day a traveller came to town. His clothing was ragged, and he had wandered from place to place begging for food. Tired and hungry, he sat down by Rabbi Chanina's front gate and looked around. "RABBI CHANINA'S GOAT FARM," screamed the large sign in front of him.

"I don't remember a goat farm here." he muttered to himself.

Mrs. ben Dosa came out and invited him to dinner.

"But this all seems familiar," he mused. "Wonder why... oh, yes, I lost my chickens here a couple o' years ago. My life's savings... never saw 'em again."

"What?" exclaimed Mrs. ben Dosa. "You did?"

The traveller continued. "A rooster and a hen, feet tied together. Ah... they're gone for good now."

"Chanina!" she called.

"Yes?" answered Chanina, appearing at the doorway.

"This man lost the chickens we found."

"You found 'em? Oh, so that's where they went. No wonder. Ah, pity. They must be dead by now."

Rabbi Chanina interjected, "That may be, but that doesn't mean.... Come with me, I want to show you something."

The pauper followed Rabbi Chanina through the gate. Before him hundreds of goats grazed on the tender grass.

"These are yours," said Rabbi Chanina.

"But... but... I lost a couple o' chickens.... This... this... but this is a multi-million dinar establishment!"

"And it is yours."

The speechless former beggar led the goats out of the yard.

"Thank you," he managed to say.

"No," replied Rabbi Chanina. "Thank you for enabling my wife and I to do the mitzvah of hashavat aveida."

Human spirit explored at North Toronto Station

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mediterraneo 2002, artist and clinical psychologist Dr. Ron Clavier's latest collection of oil paintings and limited edition photographs, is infused with warmth and banishes winter as it recalls locales in Southern France, Italy, Israel and Greece.

Clavier will be showcasing his work later this month in a striking venue, the North Toronto Station. The historic landmark on Yonge Street just south of Summerhill Avenue was once a major stop on the CPR railway line, but was converted to an LCBO retail outlet 60 years ago. Its three-storey high great hall, faced with marble walls featuring extraordinary leaded windows, was concealed by a false ceiling plus well-stocked liquor and wine shelves. Now, for a short time, a section of its former glory will be revealed.

Rosedale Equities and Equifund Corporation, the site's developer, sees the show of Clavier's paintings and photographs as an opportunity for the public to see the station as it used to be and to present architectural plans for the property.

Born in Montreal in 1948, Clavier studied art from early childhood, training for a time with his father, a professional artist who specialized in period scenes of the city's neighbourhoods.

Clavier's figurative pieces explore the unity of human anatomy and the human spirit. His landscapes and waterscapes, both representational and abstract, intensify the colours and forces of nature.

He is versatile and imaginative. His Ariadne focuses on a graceful figure from Greek mythology, gazing out to sea. He brings to life this daughter of Minos and Pasiphae, who gave Theseus the thread that enabled him to escape from the labyrinth. Deserted by Theseus, Ariadne became the bride of Dionysus.

Above all, Clavier's work is evocative. Just look at the worn stone steps in Jaffa and feel your feet descending, perhaps, to an ancient subterranean synagogue, or wonder at the blood red poppies scattered over the hillsides of such places as Netanya and you can almost touch them. An enduring little donkey, led by his master, suggests a sense of patience and devotion as he bears his heavy load with equanimity.

Clavier holds a doctorate in physiological and experimental psychology from Chicago's Northwestern University and for several years taught anatomy to medical students. He also conducted research into brain mechanisms of emotional disturbances.

Ariadne focuses on a graceful figure from Greek mythology, the bride of Dionysus gazing out to sea

In 1981, he joined the faculty of the University of Toronto and trained to practise clinical psychology. Since 1986, he has practised counselling and psychotherapy, focusing mainly on adolescents. Twenty percent of the revenue from the Mediterraneo 2002 exhibit will go to the Council on Drug Abuse.

Mediterraneo 2002 is at North Toronto Station, 1121 Yonge St., Jan. 19 and 20, 10 a.m. to 6:30 p.m.

Walking to Russia: Toronto playwright Jonathan Garfinkel's new play, Walking to Russia, previews Jan. 10 and opens Jan. 12. The story involves an elderly Jewish couple, based loosely on the playwright's grandparents, who are haunted by the spirit of their lost daughter.

Garfinkel says he was only peripherally involved in the cast rehearsals that were wrapping up last week. "There are only minor changes to make at this point," he said of the play, his first to go into full production. "I've been wanting to make sure everything is sound so I've been continuing to write, but I think it's just about there."

Garfinkel is also working on a short Holocaust-related play, The Trials of John Demjanjuk. Commissioned by the Rhubarb Festival, it is expected to open in February with a four-person cast. The Blythe Festival has also commissioned a play from Garfinkel. "I've got a number of things on the go," he said.

Walking to Russia is being staged at Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace, 16 Ryerson Ave. thru Jan. 27. $25- $18. 416-504-7529.

Complimentary Comedy: Ten years after it spotlighted a group of female stand-up comics, and helped boost the careers of Ellen De Generes and others, the comic documentary film Wisecracks is being given a free screening this week in Toronto.

Ninety minutes of entertainment, Wisecracks offers a highly stimulating and insightful look at many female comics, including stars like Whoopi Goldberg, Phyllis Diller and Sandra Shamas. De Generes has said the film gave her the worldwide exposure necessary to catapult her from the comedy club stage to television and film. Other personalities featured in the film have become major Hollywood producers and writers.

During the showing, director Gail Singer intends to film some reaction shots from the audience for use in a new film, Going to the Movies.

Monday Jan. 14, Fox Theatre, 2236 Queen St. E. The film starts at 7 p.m., and the filming starts at 6:30 and continues to 8.45 p.m. For reservations, email [going-tothemovies@hotmail.com.]

Arts Briefs

•Father-and-son entrepreneurs Ed and David Mirvish were recently spotted among the pots and pans, crystal glassware and kitschy souvenirs of their retail landmark, Honest Ed's, where they were signing copies of Toronto: The World Within a City.

The Mirvishes co-authored an essay about Toronto that appeared in the coffee-table book, published by Towery Publishing of Memphis.

•An American craft magazine has named a Canadian as one of four finalists in the Judaica category of a craft competition. Boris Kramer, of Kramer Sculptures in Beamsville, Ont., was cited by Niche Magazine for a "Simcha Menorah" that he designed. The other finalists are from New York and California. Winners are to be announced Feb. 17 at the Buyers Market of American Craft in Philadelphia. For details, visit the Web site, www.nichemag.com.

Director/actor explores Jewish issues

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Though he was a "red diaper" baby whose parents were Communists and atheists, director and actor Richard Greenblatt is proud to live life as a Jew and fasted on Yom Kippur this year for the first time.

Recently, he also observed the bar mitzvah of his son, William, a rite of passage he was denied as a boy in Montreal. His wife, the former Kate Lushington, is a director and writer, and they have three children, Natasha, 16, Wiliam, 13 and Luke, 11.

"My wife and I and the children attend services on all the High Holy Days, though I would not describe myself as a religious Jew," said Greenblatt. "The tradition of a Jew is to ask questions and that is how I identify myself. And when I say questions, I mean difficult questions, both of yourself and the world.

"We celebrate the holidays, we observe Chanukah, and we have seders at Passover and tell the stories to our children. The irony of it is that I didn't have a bar mitzvah myself.

Yet, he said, despite his parents' communism and atheism, "even in Montreal, we identified ourselves as Jews and I remember going to shul on the High Holy Days."

One of the co-stars of Two Pianos, Four Hands, Greenblatt has just finished directing Danny – King of the Basement for the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People (formerly Young People's Theatre), a play about how poor children manage to survive in society today.

He is also known for his acting in Sibs, about two estranged Jewish siblings reuniting for the funeral of a parent, and The Theory of Relatives, about Passover.

He is currently working on seven separate projects, some as an actor, some as a director and writer.

Greenblatt, who often explores Jewish themes in his work, said changes in the world since the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11 defy any simple answer to the Mideast impasse.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210.

Book says U.S. and Sweden let Wallenberg rot in gulag

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Raoul Wallenberg arrived in Budapest on July 9, 1944, an emissary of the U.S. War Refugee Board. Its mandate was to save Jews in Hungary threatened by Nazi Germany's exterminationist policy.

By that time, 437,402 Jewish men, women and children from areas outside Budapest had already been shipped on a one-way journey to Auschwitz.

Wallenberg's objective was to save the remaining 230,000 Jews left in the capital. It was an onerous task, given the fact that certain elements in the Hungarian government were eager to finish off the rest of the Jewish community.

Wallenberg, a Swedish businessman attached to Sweden's legation in Budapest, threw himself into his work with selfless energy, and managed to rescue about 100,000 Jews.

On Jan. 17, 1945, his job done, Wallenberg met with a Soviet army general, Rodion Malinovsky, in Debrecen, near the Romanian border. They were to have discussed postwar developments in Budapest.

As we all know, Wallenberg never returned from that fateful meeting. What happened to him? Did Sweden and the United States do enough to help him?

Alan Gersten, an American journalist, grapples with these and other questions in A Conspiracy of Silence (Xlibris Corp.), the latest book about Wallenberg and his mysterious disappearance nearly 60 years ago.

Using declassified U.S. Central Intelligence Agency documents, among other sources, Gersten – as one may infer from the title – argues that Sweden and the United States basically let Wallenberg rot in a Soviet gulag.

At the outset, he claims in this thought-provoking book, the United States expressed an interest in freeing Wallenberg, whom the Soviets accused of being a Nazi spy.

But after rebuffs from Sweden and the Soviet Union, he adds, "the Americans conveniently ignored Wallenberg."

Washington gathered information and voiced platitudes about Wallenberg's heroism, but "never took one step" to save him.

A succession of Swedish governments, he notes, adopted a do-nothing position so as not to provoke Moscow.

As he puts it: "Sweden was unwilling – or afraid, or both – to push the Soviets beyond paper protests."

Nor, with few exceptions, did the Wallenbergs try to assist him. "To Wallenberg supporters, the obvious answer is that the Wallenberg family carried out a lucrative business with the Nazis during World War II, and recovering Raoul Wallenberg would reawaken those unpleasant memories."

Unencumbered by any significant pressure, the Soviets buried Wallenberg in the gulag system.

According to Gersten, Wallenberg was dragged from one prison to the next. He quotes two German citizens, who spent time in Soviet gulags from 1945 to 1956, as saying they met Wallenberg in one of them, Vladimir.

Gersten briefly speculates he may have been moved to a Siberian jail, Wrangel Island, as late as 1961. But he quickly squelches that notion, citing a CIA report that there was never a prison camp there.

Throughout the decades, the Soviet Union stuck to its basic story, namely that its most famous prisoner died of a heart attack in 1947.

Not everyone, of course, accepted it at face value.

In 1990, Canadian law professor Irwin Cotler issued a report stating that Wallenberg had lived long past 1947, maybe into the 1980s.

Since the Soviet Union was not completely open about Wallenberg, we may never know the truth.

Gersten, at any rate, is certain that Wallenberg is no longer alive. This much seems certain in this sad, convoluted affair.

"When my son was bar mitzvahed, he took as his portion, the dispute between the siblings Jacob and Esau. His d'var Torah was that in a way Arabs and Jews are siblings. They came from the same father, Abraham, and it's just sibling rivalry taken to an extreme.

"My feeling is that they are two people who are closely related racially, anthropologically and historically, fighting over the same birthright, which is the Holy Land.,

"It's a very complicated, deep-rooted problem that requires a huge amount of patience and a huge amount of goodwill, and thinking about the world in different ways, and thinking about co-existing in different ways. The stakes are so high, even one individual can cause so much destruction, and you worry about terrorists doing even worse things."

Asked if the dialogue in Sibs accurately represents his position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Greenblatt said when it comes to the Middle East "I believe there is a peaceful solution.

"No one is expecting the State of Israel to disappear or the Palestinians to disappear. To say the State of Israel is about to disappear is ridiculous. Or that the Palestinians who have been there for a long time, are going to go away somewhere.

"There has to be a solution where the Jews have a homeland, where the Palestinians have a homeland, and each feels safe and that they will not be invaded."

Rio: A tale of two cities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

RIO de JANEIRO — In Portuguese, the lingua franca of Brazil, Rio is affectionately known as cidade marvailhosa, or "marvellous city." The appellation is richly deserved and not a function of mere puffery.

Rio, which marks the 500th anniversary of its founding this month by Portuguese explorer Gaspar de Lemos, is indeed a wonder to behold.

Densely populated, crammed into several verdant valleys and defined by a steep green mountain range, the Serra da Carioca, it faces a placid bay – Bahia da Guanabara – picturesquely dotted with uninhabited islets.

When you add its sandy beaches and perpetual summery weather to the mix, the combination is simply irresistible.

Brazil's capital from 1763 to 1960, Rio is best seen from two high vantage points – Pao de Acucar (Sugar Loaf) and Corcovado.

Connected by two cable cars that whisk you to the top in minutes, Sugar Loaf, at 396 metres above sea level, is Rio's signature logo.

Reached by cable car as well, Corcovado is yet higher, 710 metres. Rising from a 33-square kilometre rainforest protected as a reserve, Parque Nacional da Tijuca, Corcovado is crowned by Christ the Redeemer, a 13-storey statue that has stood here, with welcoming outstretched arms, since 1931.

Ipanema beach in Rio.

The vistas from Sugar Loaf and Corcovado are exquisite, especially on a clear, sunny day. The curving beaches and neighbourhoods of Copacabana and Ipanema. The rugged mountains stretching away into the distance. The shimmering bay. The downtown core with its clusters of skyscrapers and colonial buildings. The Jardim Botanico, the botanical gardens framed by lofty imperial palm trees.

Rio, which comes into its own with the revelry of Carnival in February, is really a tale of two cities.

It is composed of the zona sul (southerly), where the well-off reside and where tourists congregate, and the zona norte (northerly), where the working classes eke out an existence.

The favelas (shantytowns) of Rio, incongruously occupying its highest points, spill down into middle and upper-midde class neighbourhoods, a jarring reminder of Brazil's grinding Third World poverty.

Fed by the misery of the favelas, Rio once had a serious crime problem that inhibited tourism. But of late, the criminality has been brought under control by vigorous policing, and now Rio is as safe as any Latin American metropolis.

The authorities have made a special effort to keep petty criminals off the streets in the prime tourist areas of Copacabana and Ipanema/ Leblon, joined to the rest of Rio by long tunnels cutting through sheer rock.

The beaches, restaurants, cafes and hotels of Copacabana and Ipanema are the stuff of legend, burnished by Hollywood movies (Flying Down to Rio, starring Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers) and local songs (Girl from Ipanema).

On a typical day, the beaches are usually crowded with sun worshippers and bathers, some taking cover under an expanse of blue and yellow umbrellas.

Joggers and pedestrians share sidewalks decorated with wavy black and white mosaics. Cyclists glide by in adjacent bike lanes, reinforcing the perception that well-heeled Cariocas – Rio's residents – are masters of a healthy outdoor lifestyle.

Rio has many fine hotels, but the doyenne is doubtless the Copacabana Palace, a national heritage site whose dazzling white facade bespeaks an exotic elegance.

Yet, in terms of amenities, sophistication and locale, the Caesar Park, in the beating heart of Ipanema, and the Inter-Continental, just a few kilometres away in Sao Conrado, are on a par with the Copacabana Palace.

No visitor should leave Rio without having watched a plataforma song-and-dance show. Plataforma is quintessentially Brazilian, an electric spectacle of half-naked bodies, boundless energy, joyous music, bright colours and feathery costumes.

The seven neo-colonial buildings here, painted in shades of pink, yellow and pale green and trimmed with white and blue tiles, summon up the spirit of 19th-century Brazil.

The Royal Portuguese Reading Room, finished in a Flemish Gothic facade and adorned with statues of stellar Portuguese explorers like Vasca de Gama and Pedro Alvarez Cabral, is stacked with wall-to-wall shelves rising to the ceiling.

It is the repository of 300,000 books on every facet of Brazilian history, including Judaica.

Nearby, on a narrow and congested cobblestone street, is the Confeitaria Colombo, a two-storey monument to Belle Epoch architecture rich with Belgian mirrors, rosewood showcases, Italian marble benches, ornate light fixtures and period furniture.

Strong Brazilian coffee and wickedly caloric pastries are consumed on the first floor. The buffet, dispensing a variety of local and regional dishes, is upstairs.

Brazil's largest theatre, with a seating capacity of 2,361, the Teatro Municipal is resplendent with sweeping marble staircases, stained glass ceilings, half-ton chandeliers, bevelled crystal windows, heavy bronze doors and Art Nouveau statues.

It epitomizes an era of excess in Brazil's development as a South American powerhouse.

Winnipeg CJA gets new president

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Ian Goldstine, the new president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal, and his wife, Elaine, community work has long been a family affair.

Elaine has been director of Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal Women's campaign for several years while Ian has served on the Federation Board since the mid-1990s and before that co-chaired the doctor's division of the annual CJA campaign.

The 46-year-old former family physician is a lifelong Winnipegger. He left family practice two years ago and is currently medical consultant for the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Manitoba and medical advisor to the Workers Compensation Board's pain management unit.

In the Jewish community, his record of involvement includes leadership roles in the professional and business division, Winnipeg chapter, of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Community Centre as well as Federation/CJA.

Goldstine inherits a legacy of increased annual CJA revenues over the past two years – the campaign expects to raise $3.75 million this year and $4 million next year – and a plan to increase Winnipeg's Jewish population from its current 14,000 to about 18,000.

Goldstine says he looks forward to the challenges and talks about the need to improve communications with Federation/CJA beneficiaries and other Jewish community organizations.

"We need to break down barriers and talk to each other if we are to successfully meet the challenges ahead," Goldstine says.

He plans to attend at least one board meeting of every community agency to familiarize himself with community issues. "I intend to spend a lot of time listening to what people have to say," he says. "To be a good president, I believe that you have to be a good listener."

More Stories From My Father's Court

A collection of newly translated Isaac Bashevis Singer stories

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Yiddish author Isaac Bashevis Singer was prolific in his lifetime and remains so a decade after his death.

The Nobel Prize-winning novelist and short-story writer died in 1991, but newly translated works by him continue to appear in English, most mined from the pages of the Yiddish Daily Forward, to which he was a longtime contributor.

More Stories from My Father's Court, a collection of 27 pieces translated by Curt Leviant and published in paperback by Farrar, Strauss & Giroux, shows that despite the reason Singer may have had for leaving these pieces untranslated, it had little to do with their quality, which ranges from good to superb.

Singer grew up in a rabbinic household on Warsaw's Krochmalna Street before World War I. Troubled Jews in the neighbourhood streamed to his father's court, or beit din, eager for advice; the future writer, then a boy, was usually lurking in the woodwork, all ears and imagination.

Singer originally published the pieces under his journalistic pseudonym, Isaac Warshawsky. He regarded them as a literary experiment that combined the memoir and the belle-lettre. The first collection, In My Father's Court, greatly charmed the critics when it was first published in English in 1966.

For Singer fans, the appearance of this second collection so belatedly and unexpectedly can only be regarded as a delightful surprise.

Some of the stories in this collection seem to focus on people with darker secrets than those in the first collection. These Warsavian Jews are possibly possessed by dybbuks; they curse and cast spells on one another and live brazenly in sin: one man calls his wife a whore but doesn't seem to mind that she's having an affair right under his nose.

Some characters are portrayed as living in ignorance and even spiritual squalor, as if they know that they are the final generation of a doomed and dying civilization. Even several rabbis who visit the author's father – including a rabbi and his family who, seeking a viable livelihood, abandon their faith and go to America; and another rabbi of small accomplishments but a huge ego – seem to have lost their lofty Jewish ideals.

These are simple sketches, brilliantly rendered, resulting in the presentation of a rich and complex moral universe. Although perhaps the second collection doesn't sparkle with quite the same lustre as the first, it is a worthy and compelling successor.

Goalie's exploits noticed by Central Scouting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When last we checked in on him, Robert Gherson was a rookie goaltender with the OHL's Sarnia Sting, fighting to break into the starting lineup.

He got into his share of games and performed well, but never grabbed the starter's mantle.

That was last season.

This year, he started slowly and had to fight for the starting job, but he responded with hard work and improvements in the technical aspects of his game.

The results are in and they are impressive. In the current season, the lanky Toronto-born goalie edged out the team's incumbent starter, becoming the Sting's uncontested number 1 goalie.

What's more, NHL Central Scouting recently ranked him as the second best prospect among Ontario goalies going into the summer's amateur entry draft.

His GM, Terry Doran, believes Gherson is even better than Central Scouting gives him credit for.

"My view is that he's the top goalie in Ontario," Doran said, ranking ahead of Central Scouting's number one netminder, Tyson Kellerman of North Bay.

Unlike Kellerman, who's split the netminding duties for the Centennials, Gherson has played in the majority of the team's first games, taking on the toughest opponents behind a team that could charitably be termed defensively challenged.

Gherson is the go-to guy in Sarnia, starting in 32 of the team's first 40 games. Named OHL goaltender of the month for November after appearing in 11 of the Sting's 12 games and registering a 6-3-0-2 record, Gherson was named the game's first star twice and one of three stars in five of the games he appeared in.

With an .897 save percentage and a 3.62 goals against average and a 14-17 won-loss record, Gherson's stats are not exactly in the Patrick Roy category.

But he's constantly improving and making enough saves to give his team a chance to win most games.

"Technically, he's pretty good, his reflexes are quick," Doran said. "He's at his best when he's at the top of the crease, facing the shooter."

Doran believes Gherson will go high in the draft, with a good chance of eventually playing in the NHL.

Gherson's play has really picked up in the last two months and that helped him move up in the rankings, Guy said.

"His consistency has improved. He's had a string of very strong games."

While his overall save percentage is still in the .800s, in November it was over .900, Guy pointed out.

"That's phenomenal for a goaltender for a team who's' defence is definitely not experienced."

Still, he's only 18 and at six feet, 152 lbs., a bit of a string bean.

"He's got to work on getting bigger and stronger," Doran acknowledges. "He needs strength to take on a rigorous schedule. And he has to work on handling the puck behind the net."

Still, Doran is optimistic Gherson has what it takes to succeed in hockey. "He's a great kid and he's willing to learn. He's very coachable," he said.

Football handicapper is no tout

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — It stands to reason that if a couple decides to build a dream home, they hire an architect. When an individual purchases a home or business, he usually employs the services of a lawyer. And, unless you're a handyman, you phone a plumber to repair a clogged drain.

But when it comes to wagering a loonie or two on a sports event, how many people actually enlist the expertise of a professional handicapper?

Sports fans in Winnipeg, especially those who enjoy National Football League games on cable or satellite TV, are probably familiar with the name Max Feierstein.

His NFL Picks column appears each week in the Winnipeg Free Press, in which he attempts to predict the outcome of upcoming weekend games.

A computer scientist by training, Feierstein assesses the games' point lines, attempting to dope out the winner and final score.

Feierstein works for Jerry Patterson Enterprises, which is based both in New Jersey and Carson City, Nev.

He provides services for 52 football clients in the United States – none in Winnipeg – contacting them via e-mail on Friday mornings prior to the Sunday action, with his mathematically-determined assessment of the upcoming games.

Feierstein is neither a tout nor a bookie. To the uninitiated, they may seem the same, but they are substantially different. A tout will say, "Take Detroit over Chicago; it's a sure-fire bet" and be paid for the supposed "hot tip of the day." A bookie will take a bet, which Feierstein never does, and pay off winners or collect from losers.

"I come up with the indexes or power ratings for each team. It takes years of experience and I am still learning. I keep charts over the years for all the sports… The methods I use are all mathematical," he says, pointing out the principles he employs are much like those used by stockbrokers.

Feierstein sells his knowledge for a fee but never, like the tout, gives the winner. He arms clients with the information that ought to increase the chance of winning and he leaves it up to the bettor to find the best betting line, whether in Las Vegas or over the Internet, where such services are available offshore.

No doubt, the vast majority of serious sports fans can pick winners more than 50 percent of the time if point lines were not involved. But point factors enter into most wagers.

For example, it's clear Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate boys in Winnipeg would never defeat the CFL's Blue Bombers in a serious football game. But what would be the betting line? Maybe the Bombers would be favoured by say, an unheard of 280 points, or 40 touchdowns. Would the Big Blue have enough time in 60 minutes to beat the spread? Therein lies the bet.

Feierstein has been known to Manitoba sports fans since the 1980s, when he played goal with the Portage Terriers and Selkirk Steelers of the Manitoba Junior Hockey League, and later in the senior circuit with the now defunct St. Boniface Mohawks.

He's has been steeped in sports all his life. He was also a player-coach in the Red Boine Senior Baseball League, playing first base and catcher.

He also has a background in computer science from the University of Manitoba, which led to a full-time position with a firm known as LGS. "I am a regional manager," he says. "We're an information technology consulting firm. We have 10 to 15 major companies such as Great West Life, Investors Group, Manitoba Telephone System, and the Canadian Wheat Board."

That's his day job, but his avocation takes in most sports, be it college basketball or football, or major league baseball, basketball, hockey or football. If you're really starved for alternatives, he even handicaps arena football.

"I got started when I met Jerry [Patterson's] son while attending a maths conference in New Orleans," Feierstein says. "We started talking about sports and betting and he put his dad, Jerry, who teaches people how to bet on sports, in touch with me."

That was about 10 years ago. "Since then I've done seminars on gambling in Las Vegas myself, at Union Plaza, Caesars, and Palace Station," he says. "I give them some of the tricks."

Can a person, armed with all the data he can gather from Feierstein or other information sources, actually get rich taking such risks? "It's a very tough way to make a living," he admits. "You have to have very good money management skills, which I try to teach, and know when to bet a game and when not to.

"I take my hat off to people who can make a living betting sports," he says.

Casting Asper-sions

Journalists are, predictably, the first to hyperventilate whenever someone tinkers with the supposed sacrosanctity of their craft. Deprived of a high horse, others sees things much more clearly.

The op-ed pages of late have blared shrilly of the coming gloom-and-doom imposed by Winnipeg's Asper family, which has acquired Southam News and its 14 dailies, along with the National Post. The Aspers, writers decry, have invented "national editorials," which are written at Winnipeg headquarters and ordered to run in all their papers once a week (soon to be three times weekly). Individual papers are powerless to oppose them, even if the editorials are inimical to local standards.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Writing in the Globe and Mail, Peter Desbarats, a former dean of journalism at the University of Western Ontario and longtime authority on the concentration of Canadian media ownership, opined that the Aspers have "broke[n] with tradition by using [their] editorial power to influence the nation's political agenda."

What planet has Desbarats been inhabiting? Since when has any Canadian media outlet not used its editorial power to influence the nation's political agenda? As one letter-to-the-editor writer put it, after profitability, wielding political power by controlling and colouring information is the media's very raison d'etre. Conrad Black had no trouble using the National Post as a personal platform to attack Jean Chrétien and the federal Liberals, sometimes in very nasty terms. The ferocity of the assaults were outdone only by their uniformity.

Speaking of which, as another letter writer pointed out, the Globe's editorials in Victoria and Halifax are identical to those in Toronto and Ottawa, a "nationwide uniformity that delivers a strong political punch." As another reader put it, the Aspers are just more transparent and greater sinners only by a matter of degree.

John Miller, director of newspaper journalism at Ryerson University, warned in the Toronto Star that if the public doesn't speak up about the Aspers' one-size-fits-all editorials, "one of Canada's major media owners will have gotten away with one of the worst abuses of corporate ownership in recent history, and one that has the potential of permanently damaging the spectrum of public debate and the credibility of the press in this country."

It shouldn't be lost on anyone that Miller was writing in a paper run by a family that wears its Liberal bias on its sleeve, and, for that matter, isn't especially enamoured of Israel as a matter of editorial policy. The Star's credibility has long been suspect.

Quebec journalist Lysiane Gagnon weighed in with the following: "The Aspers' philistine forays into a trade they know nothing about will undermine the credibility of their newspapers, and are commercially stupid to boot, for papers that don't reflect their communities' interests cannot survive. This is especially true for the [Montreal] Gazette, the flagship of a highly educated community." The Gazette? Is this the same paper that, through its compliance and spinelessness in the face of 30 years of Parti Québecois excess, has done more to alienate Anglos and Jews than any single institution in Canada?

What worries me more than the Aspers' opinions being forced on us is their influence on the news, especially as it relates to Israel. Apparently, any article in the chain even mildly critical of Israel must be scrutinized by headquarters before being published. As owners, the Aspers are entitled to air their thoughts, self-serving though they may be, and we, as sentient beings, are entitled to disagree with them. But the Jewish community, well-versed in these affairs, is more than capable of battling biased reporting without help from the boss.

About Education

Seymour Epstein

No lesson is beyond the learner if the learner comes first. Moses learned that early in his career.

Moses our Teacher was given that title because he became the prototype of the Jewish teacher. He is indeed our teacher, but also the teacher of our teachers. In the Torah portion of this week, Va'era, Moses is still young, at the very beginning of his career. I have often wondered what would happen if we asked veteran teachers to reminisce about pedagogic errors they made early in their careers, and I always think of a passage at the beginning of Va'era that is just that.

Pirkei Avot teaches us that the wise person learns from everyone, but sometimes the lesson is what not to do. In the spirit of keeping Moses human and an accessible model, we can learn a lesson in communications from this early moment in his career.

Shmot chapter 6, verses 2-8 are an eloquent statement of the promise that God will end the slavery of Egypt and deliver the Israelites to freedom in their own land. So elegant is the language that the rabbis revered these words as the four expressions of redemption. This speech could have become the central liberating document of our people were it not for the reception it got by the Israelites themselves.

The text tells us that Moses spoke the words to the Israelites, but "they did not heed Moses because of shortness of breath [emphysema?] and hard labour." It's easy enough to understand why the people could not listen, but the real pedagogic question hidden in the biblical text is how Moses taught God's words. The original text is eloquent and inspiring to us after the fact, but we wonder whether Moses merely repeated the message. If so, perhaps he should have recrafted the message to suit the particular needs of his enslaved and worn-out audience.

It is from this early mismatch of message and audience that we learn that every teacher must begin from the starting point of the students, not from the lesson itself. Moses went on to become Moses, our master, but only after he learned some important pedagogics on the way.

Mount Sinai Hospital study shows that support group participation does not prolong survival in metastatic breast cancer patients

A Mount Sinai Hospital study conducted at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute on support group participation among metastatic breast cancer patients has created a stir in the international media. The study, known as the Breast Expressive-Support Therapy (BEST), was published in the New England Journal of Medicine on December 12. The team found that participating in supportive-expressive group therapy does not prolong the life of women with metastatic breast cancer but that it does have beneficial psychological effects for these women if they are distressed or in pain.

This is good news for many women with breast cancer. If they choose not to participate in a support group, they need not feel that they have lost out on the opportunity to prolong their lives.

The research team was led by Dr. Pamela Goodwin, the Director of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, with MSH co-investigators: Dr. Molyn Leszcz of the Department of Psychiatry; Vice-President of Nursing, Leslie Vincent; and Dr. Jonathan Hunter of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre (Psychiatry).

The study resulted in high-profile stories in the New York Times, the Washington Post, USA Today, the Globe and Mail, NBC, and CTV National News, among others.

The Schwartz-Reisman Emergency Centre has recently been made more beautiful with the addition of six paintings depicting different stages of life, from birth to retirement. The paintings were commissioned for the Centre by Heather Reisman and Gerry Schwartz. "This is a magnificent and uplifting compliment to our emergency centre," said Joseph Mapa, President and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital. Sharing Secrets Cookbook

Sharing Secrets, the newest Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary Cookbook, was recently launched at Indigo Books. Co-Editors of the book, Rona Cappell and Elise Mecklinger have done an outstanding job of preparing and tasting the many recipes that were submitted and then going through the laborious task of writing and editing all the recipes.

The books are available at Chapters, Indigo, the Hospital Gift Shop (416-586-8315) and at other independent bookstores in and around Toronto. You are also welcome to call the Auxiliary office to order at 416-586-8290 or toll-free at 1-888-509-8290.

Raising the bar

As anticipated, the Auxiliary has raised the bar once again! At Wine Down Easy, at the Easy and The Fifth, the Auxiliary was host to over 300 guests. The evening not only included dinner and dancing but also featured a silent auction of rare and vintage wine exceeding $125,000 in value. It proved to be a wine aficionado's delight, as all the lots of wine were sold. "High spirits" were in the air during a live auction where one rare bottle of wine, a 1997 Screaming Eagle, was sold for $2,600! Congratulations go to Nonie Plener and Candy Schnier, the Co-Chairs of this event along with their committee for hosting an evening to remember. Pictured here are:

The Talmud (Tractate Sotah 12) relates an amazing story about the circumstances and events "behind the scenes" that made the continued survival of the Jewish people possible in Egypt. The Talmud describes a scene in which Miriam, who was then just a young child, speaks up boldly to her father, Amram, the head of the Sanhedrin, who was obeyed by the entire Jewish nation. The background for that confrontation was Amram's decision to divorce his wife, Yocheved, because of Pharaoh's decree to throw all newborn male babies into the Nile.

Amram's decision was "logical" — namely, he reasoned that it would be better to divorce his wife than to bring to the world children who were going to be cruelly murdered by Pharaoh. The child Miriam came up with her own reasoning. She told her father, the head of the Sanhedrin, that his decree was worse than Pharaoh's! Pharaoh, she said, made a decree only about the males, while he, by deciding to divorce his wife, would bring about a total cessation of births, both of males and of females, thus condemning the Jewish people to exctinction. His daughter Miriam's hard and obvious claims made Amram take back his wife, Yocheved; and all the Jews followed suit. This story makes one truly wonder — how could the head of the Sanhedrin, the unanimously accepted leader of the people, reach — by using his logic — such a dangerous, mistaken decision, that was liable to bring about the annihilation of the Jewish people? We must not cast doubt on the keen mental faculties of the head of the Sanhedrin, and it is inconceivable that Amram did what he did without giving full consideration to his deeds. How can it be that the head of the Sanhedrin does not understand what his very young daughter does? The continuation of the Biblical story reveals some more about Miriam's motivation.The Scripture calls Miriam "Puah, the midwife," because of her activities to encourage childbirth and tend to newborn babies. Later on, it is she who goes out to find out what has become of her brother, Moshe, and to ascertain that he is in the right hands. All these stories point to one theme in Miriam's activities: Miriam did not deliver nice homilies; rather, she went everywhere personally in order to encourage childbirth. What stood before her eyes, and what also made her feel shocked by her father's behavior, was the motherly instinct, imprinted in her from birth by the Almighty. While Amram sought, with male logic, ways to prevent the killing of Jewish children, Miriam was thinking in exactly the opposite way — namely, she was seeking ways to increase childbirth. What explains this tremendous difference between the two is Miriam's loyalty to her role of "mother," a role imprinted by G-d in the very nature of women. Miriam's simple emotion just could not grasp how it can be possible to stop childbirth.This inner truth made Miriam operate incessantly to attain her goal as midwife, and her motherly instinct drove her to take care of Israel's leader — Moshe —the one that eventually redeemed Israel from servitude.

In these difficult times we, too, must brace ourselves and pursue the path paved for us by Miriam: to strengthen the natural motherly instinct that exists within each and every woman. We must do whatever we can to save the unborn children of our people. The children bolstered the depressed spirit of the Jews in Egypt and helped bring the eventual redemption. Saving the children will revive the spirit of the Jewish people today, and will bring about our redemption from all our tribulations, speedily in our days, Amen.

A HEARTFELT APPEAL TO A HOLY NATION

The highly acclaimed EFRAT Organization has taken upon itself the lofty duty of saving the lives of unborn children. EFRAT saves many hundreds from abortion by providing information together with financial support for families in distress. EFRAT's endeavors to prevent this horrendous decree of death to unborn children, involves extensive expenses which are used for actual financial assistance to families.

We therefore call upon you to assist them in their praiseworthy endeavors, each according to his means. May Heaven bless all those who come to their aid in every way, with life. prosperity, health and supreme light.

I hereby acknowledge receipt of your letter of 7 Sivan, in which I was asked to give my opinion regarding the question, can one give donations to EFRAT out of tithe money.

The blessed actions of EFRAT, which is involved in saving unborn Jewish children, are already widely known among the public, and whoever gives a hand in sustaining EFRAT and helping it expand its beneficial activities, is a partner in saving the souls of Jewish children.

In Yoreh De'ah, section 249, and the Acharonim there, there are differences of opinion as to the question, if one fulfill one's obligation by giving tithe Ma'asar money to other mitzvot. However, regarding the issue at hand there are two positive aspects simultaneously: sustaining and helping the poor, and saving lives.

May G-d pour down His blessing and open blind eyes to choose the path of Torah, which gives life, happiness, richness and splendor.

With blessings for success,

We must all be deeply grateful to EFRAT, under the direction of our precious and prominent friend Dr. Schussheim, who does so much, and invests his energies and financial resources in this institution. EFRAT was established in order to operate in two areas: (a) to give guidance, encouragement and information in order to prevent abortions; (b) to grant financial assistance in a dignified way to those who need it, both during the pregnancy and after the birth.

Thank G-d, they have done a lot to prevent thousands, even tens of thousands of abortions — through lectures and publications that explain implications of abortion, including the the physical damage to the woman.

Our Sages say that Shifrah and Puah, the midwives, were actually Yocheved, Moshe's mother, and Miriam, Moshe's sister. When Pharaoh saw that the Israelites were increasing in number in a supernatural way, he ordered the two midwives to become murderers by killing the newborn babies (Exodus 1:16). But they refused, despite the fact that they were liable to extremely heavy punishment, even death. Our sages say that Miriam, who is also called Puah and Efrat, cried to Pharaoh: How can you, a king, say something like that? Pharaoh wanted to kill her for that, but Yocheved stood up and told Pharaoh: Why are you getting so excited about something that a little girl says? Leave her alone! Our Sages relate that the King of Egypt did not do them any harm (Midrash Exodus Rabbah 1:47).

Our Sages add that not only did they not kill the babies, but they also did them further favors. For example: if the mother was poor, they would go around and collect water and food for her from rich homes, and thus revive such mothers and their babies.

This is also the way of the EFRAT Organization, that does its utmost to prevent abortions. If a woman, or her husband, have no possibility of sustaining the baby once it is born, EFRAT finances all expenses, sometimes even diapers and food, for the entire family. Happy are they and happy is their lot, and happy is whoever assists them; for in helping to sustain even one soul, it is as if one has sustained an entire world.

May they, through this merit, enjoy perfect health, happiness and prosperity, and may they succeed wherever they go, both materially and spiritually. May this merit also benefit the entire People of Israel, and may they dwell in their country in calm and in peace, with no threats. Our Sages say that every boy or girl that is born brings the redemption closer — may it come speedily in our days, Amen.

Message from the Editor

Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, ordered Yocheved and Miriam to kill all male babies. "And he said, when you are a midwife to the Hebrew women... if it is a son, then you shall kill him, but if it is a daughter then she shall live" (Exodus 1:16). This extremely cruel decree raises a big question: How could Pharaoh possibly think that he would be able to convince the two most prominent Jewish women — the wife and the daughter of the Head of the Sanhedrin — to kill the Jewish children? How could he expect them not to object to his decree? The Be'er Moshe says that Pharaoh thought that turning precisely to these two women would make it possible for him to carry out his cruel decree.

Pharaoh knew that if he were to make a decree such as "Every son that is born you shall cast into the Nile," the result would be an uprise against him. Therefore he plays the naive and gives them the following advice: Look, the Jewish people are now in a difficult economic and moral situation. Slavery is full of hardship, poverty is great — what mother would want her child to be born into a situation like this? What mother who cares about the future, education and daily sustenance of her children can afford to give birth in Egypt? Any person with the least amount of sense understands that in such a situation, it would be best to kill the baby just as it is born. You, the Jewish midwives, of all people, must be "humane" and help spare the poor babies, whose future seems so bleak, from the suffering to which they are destined, even before they are born.

In order to show to the midwives how he really "cares" about the future of the babies, and to prove to them that he has no ulterior motive, Pharaoh adds that actually, the Jewish women themselves can solve the economic difficulties — since they can marry Egyptians. He also adds that it is our moral duty to kill the males, for their own good.

What was Yocheved and Miriam's reaction to Pharaoh's decree? — Economic support! The midrash (Exodus Rabbah 1) says: "'And they saved the children' — this is a praise within a praise; not only did they not fulfill Pharaoh's decree, but they also did the babies further favors. The midwives would go and take water and food from the houses of the rich ones and give to the poor ones, thus helping sustain their children."

AS IN THE PAST, today we must also save the children of Israel. Get involved!

For the Shabbos Table

"But the midwives feared G-d, and did not do as the king of Egypt commanded them"* (Exodus 1:17)

The Midrash relates how Yocheved and Miriam fed the babies and tended to all their needs. The question arises: Why does the Torah mention only one virtue — their fear of G-d? Were they rewarded only for that?

Rabbi M. Rubman ZT"L, in his book Zichron Meir, answers that virtues alone would not have enabled the midwives to do what they did. Breaking the king's decree can be done only by one who is filled with fear of G-d; only such a person can rise to such conduct, while ignoring the great danger. The Torah, then, mentions the true reason for their conduct.

"Therefore G-d dealt well with the midwives, and the people multiplied, and [they] grew very mighty"* (Exodus 1:20)

Scripture does not specify what was the good that befell the midwives because of the people's multiplying. One may say (based on Pirkei Avot 6:11) that "the Almighty wanted to give merit to Israel, therefore He gave them much Torah and commandments." In other words, much Torah and many commandments means a great reward. Here, G-d wanted the midwives to enjoy the reward of their numerous mitzvot — keeping the babies alive, which resulted in the great increase in numbers of the Jewish people, and their reward became greater and greater. (Tosefet Beracha)

On the basis of this same mishnah one can also say: becoming more numerous means that there were more Jews who performed the mitzvot, and the mitzvot performed by those babies were accredited to the midwives. Therefore, their reward was very great.

"And it came to pass, because the midwives feared G-d, that He made them houses"* (Exodus 1:21)

Rashi: "Houses of cohanim and houses of Levites from Yocheved, and kingship from Miriam." G-d runs His world according to the principle of "measure for measure," why did Yocheved and Miriam merit to be rewarded by lineage?

Rabbi Yosef Dov Soloveitchik ZT"L answers this in light of the ruling that says that the children of Jewish women who marry non-Jews are 100% Jewish, because they go by the mother; whereas a child is decreed a Levite or a Cohen according to the tribal lineage —namely, by the father.

The explanation, then, is: Pharaoh wanted to kill the males and keep the females. Had he succeeded, the Jewish people would not have perished, because the babies, who go by the mother, would still have been Jewish. The lineage, however, would have been lost. Therefore, by refusing to fulfill Pharaoh's orders, even by risking their lives, the midwives made it possible to protect and retain the lineage of the Jewish people.

A Short Chassidic Story

Once, some people came to Rabbi Yehoshua Tronk - known as Rabbi Yehoshua'leh of Kutno, author of the important works: Yeshuos Yisrael and Yeshous Malko - with a question about a woman who was having such a difficult labor, that the doctors considered killing the fetus in order to save her. The rabbi said with great emotion: "G-d forbid! In this day and age, we do not judge in capital cases!" The Rav began praying with great fervor for her recovery. While still in prayer, the good news came that the woman gave birth, thank G-d, to a healthy baby.

Unfortunately, quite often here, at EFRAT, we hear Pharaoh's claim about the moral duty to abort children whose economic future is uncertain. We hear it from hundreds of pregnant women who are in financial straits, due to which they intend to abort the fruit of their womb. They do not really want to kill their children, G-d forbid; but they, too, ask themselves what they can do in the difficult situation they are in. For a child who has already been born, they would be willing to make any effort; but the fetus within the womb, why, it is not a human being yet! And so, the financial situation tips the scales in favor of abortion.

The question I always ask myself in such situations is, did our parents also make similar economic calculations before we were born? What would have remained of the Jewish people had our forefathers in Egypt taken their financial situation into consideration, and accepted Pharaoh's advice to dispose of their sons? Would the Jewish people exist today? — The answer is an unequivocal No!

The true solution, which EFRAT offers to pregnant women in distress who consider having an abortion, is the same solution offered by Yocheved and Miriam: to accompany and support them, both psychologically and financially, so that not a single Jewish life be lost, G-d forbid.

This approach is of two-fold importance: it is a genuine rescue of lives, as well as a true fulfillment of the commandment of Tzedakah (charity).

EFRAT, that accompanies and supports women who, due to a transient state of distress, consider abortion, has succeeded in the past year in rescuing 1,186 babies from abortion — the modern-day "Every son that is born you shall cast into the Nile." Before they were born, these children were unwanted; but once born, they bring great happiness to their families. In the course of the 25 years of EFRAT's operation, the lives of tens of thousands of babies have been saved. Thus far, not a single woman has expressed any regret for having given birth to her baby.

Thank G-d, since the large-scale campaign we held some six months ago, in which EFRAT distributed 350,000 information kits (as reported in detail in the previous issue of ATIDENU — Our Future), there has been a significant increase in the number of women who understand the true implications of abortion, and who have decided to turn to EFRAT for assistance. The sum required for rescuing one baby is only $1,000. This sum enables us to give a monthly payment to the woman and her baby, to buy for her, if there is a need, some basic equipment for the newborn (a bassinet or a crib, a stroller, a baby bath, and the like), and also give her psychological and medical advice. $1,000 for saving a child — is a small sum. What is $1,000 when measured against an entire life span of a human being and his or her descendants? However, when the number of cases which we deem worthy of support increases, the sums add up to great amounts, that our budget cannot handel. Unfortunately, lately we were constrained to stop supporting a number of pregnancies — an act that is liable to bring about the termination of those women not with the birth of sweet, happy babies, but, G-d forbid, in undesirable ways. Given this critical situation, which involves the actual saving of many lives, we have decided — after consulting Israel's greatest Rabbinic authorities — to launch an emergency fundraising campaign, in which we plead for the lives of so many thousands of babies who are crying out their mute cry for life.

We hope that their cry will fall on your attentive ears. Please give us your generous contribution and become our partners in saving more lives.

Chagai Goldshmidt
Secretary-General
EFRAT

Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai says: "Three kinds of people drive the Shechinah away from the world and because of them people cry out and are not answered. These are: ...he who murders his offspring in their mother's womb, for he destroys what G-d has built, and such a person is worse than a murderer, for it is his own children that he kills..." (Zohar, Exodus 3)

Saving a Child is equal to Saving An Entire World

During the time of Pharaoh, the very survival of the Jewish people was at stake. Pharaoh had decreed to the Jewish midwives: "When you deliver the Hebrew women, and you see them on the birthstone, if it is a son, you are to kill him..." (Shemos 1:16). Pharaoh knew well that without sons there could be no fathers, and without fathers, there would be no new generation of Jews. If the plan had worked, then within a short span of time, Klal Yisroel would have ceased to exist.

The decisive response of Yocheved and Miriam, the mother and sister of Moshe Rabbeinu respectively, was legendary, and, in fact, set the standard for all time. "Vatichayena es hayeladim -- and they caused the boys to live." With complete devotion and in total self-sacrifice, they defied Pharaoh's edict and saved and sustained countless Jewish lives. Today, we face a similar challenge, as Jewish lives are again at risk. This time, however, we are doing it to ourselves. We have become the agents of our own destruction. As difficult as it is to comprehend, Jewish women are accomplishing what Pharaoh had set out to do. They are "drowning" their unborn children in the sea of abortion. We, a nation that so recently lost 1.5 million children during the Churban Europa, are living in the midst of a self-declared Holocaust, which for the most part, is being perpetrated through a lack of understanding and knowledge about the sanctity of human life.

Chazal, in Mesechta Sanhedrin (37a), explain that the Sanhedrin would try to convince would-be-killers to abandon their plans. The dayanim of the Sanhedrin would warn witnesses who were about to commit perjury and condemn an innocent man to his death to think twice regarding what they were about to do with the following admonition: Hashem created Adam. The first man was created alone. Why didn't Hashem create millions of human beings at one time? To teach us that whoever, kills a single man of Israel, is considered by the Torah as if he had destroyed the entire world; and whoever preserves a single member of Klal Yisroel is considered by the Torah to have sustained the entire world.

The would-be killer, in effect, was told to consider the importance and greatness of his intended victim. The entire world, he was told, was created for that person's life, he is preserving the world. If this admonition was not enough, the Mishna concludes: If a man strikes many coins from one mold, they all resemble one another. However, the supreme King of kings, Hakadosh Baruch Hu, fashioned every man in the stamp of the first man, Adam, yet, not one of them resembles his fellow. Therefore, every single person is obligated to say: "The world was created for me."

As Rashi explains, if the would-be-killer would only recognize his own greatness, he would never succumb to sin. The Sanhedrin, in short, is trying to motivate the would-be-killer to preserve life by impressing upon him the uniqueness and sanctity of his own life as well as that of his intended victim.

The lesson for us is clear. Jewish women, the future mothers of Klal Yisroel, must be taught how precious the fetus is; and, in turn, how special they are. Once they have this appreciation, they will always choose life. Indeed, this basic concept, the need to nurture a feeling of self worth, plays a prominent role in the spirituality of every Jew. My Rebbi, Maran Hagaon Harav Shlomo Zalman Auerbach, ZT"L, stressed countless times his understanding of the underlying foundation for each and every aveira that a person, chas v'shalom transgresses. According to Rav Shlomo Zalman, it is atzvus, literally a sense or even a state of depression. If an individual would only realize his own self worth, his own inner greatness, said Rav Shlomo Zalman, he would never succumb to sin. A person who feels exalted will do everything in his power to maintain that lofty state. EFRAT, directed by my dear friend, the venerable Dr. Eli Schussheim, Shlita, encourages the mother-to-be to be a mother. They inspire her to recognize her own special potential and to take her royal place in shaping the destiny of the Jewish people. EFRAT acts decisively, just as Miriam and Yocheved did some 3,400 years ago. They awaken the natural maternal feelings in the mother-to-be and persuade her through emotional support, as well as by subsidizing the increased financial costs associated with having a child, such as the cost of cribs, clothing diapers, formula, food, medical care and counseling.

RCHM"L, over two million neshamos have been lost in Eretz Yisroel through abortion. With your generous support, ten of thousands of lives will be saved. The future of the Jewish people is in our hands. Let us rise to the challenge.

Snow! The Great White... Holy Land

Snowstorms hit Israel last week from Jerusalem all the way to the north. In the top photo, the Jerusalem skyline of grey and gold is a landscape blanketed in white. The two accompanying photos are scenes more typical of a Canadian winter - the road near Kibbutz Margoliot being cleared by a tractor and children struggling to build a snowman.

Gray defends Israel visit

Responds to Globe and Mail

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray is strongly defending his attendance at a meeting last week in Jerusalem of elected Jewish politicians from around the world organized by an Israeli think-tank.

Gray was responding to issues raised in a Jan. 8 front-page story in the Globe and Mail that said an "influential" group of five Canadian Liberal MPs – including two cabinet ministers – and two Liberal senators was "lending its support to Israel" by attending the meeting.

Herb Gray

The article also implied that the Canadians were compromised because the organizers of the conference, which the article identified as "the Israeli government," had offered to pay their expenses.

In a telephone interview with The CJN that he initiated from Jerusalem, Gray said that "attending the conference indicates support for Israel, but this is totally consistent with Canada's foreign policy, which supports Israel behind secure borders".

The News in Brief

CANADA

Interfaith Service

TORONTO — Synagogues have been invited to take part in a day of interfaith prayer slated for Jan. 24. The services will take place in six Toronto-area Roman Catholic parishes and will coincide with a day-long meeting between religious leaders and Pope John Paul in Assisi, Italy the same day. The Pope and representatives of several faiths, including Judaism, are to sign "a common commitment to peace." Faith groups in Toronto will also pray for peace.

ISRAEL

Enhanced Benefits

JERUSALEM — Israel has approved enhanced absorption benefits for new immigrants from France and South Africa. Immigrants from those countries who arrive during the next year will be awarded the same benefits as olim from the former Soviet Union and other countries. Immigrants from South Africa will also receive a special $10,000 housing acquisition assistance and a $1,400 stipend from the Jewish Agency for Israel. The government and Jewish Agency recently increased benefits to Argentine immigrants in the wake of the economic and political crisis there.

Clinton to Speak

JERUSALEM — Former U.S. President Bill Clinton is slated to visit Israel this month to receive an honorary degree from Tel Aviv University. Clinton is scheduled to give a speech on the Middle East peace process Jan. 20 in Tel Aviv and participate in the opening of the Clinton Centre for American Studies at the university.

Female Director

JERUSALEM — For the first time in Israel, a woman has been appointed director of a hospital. Dr. Orna Blondheim was appointed director of the Schneider Children's Medical Centre in Petach Tikvah. Blondheim, 46, previously served as deputy director of the Ha'emek hospital in Afula.

Refusing Service

JERUSALEM — Three more Israelis were jailed for refusing to serve in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. In all, 36 army reservists have been given jail terms for refusing to serve in the territories during the current intifadah. The three reservists were given sentences ranging from 18 to 30 days in military prison.

'Jew Boy' Remark

JERUSALEM — An Israeli legislator called the U.S. ambassador to Israel a "a little Jew boy." MK Tzvi Hendel was criticizing Daniel Kurtzer, who had said Israel was spending money on communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip instead of helping the disabled.

WORLD

Flatow Scholarship

RIVER EDGE, N.J. — Scholarship applications are available for the 2002-03 academic year for those planning to study in Israel. The Alisa Flatow Memorial Scholarship Fund was established after its namesake, a New Jersey native, was killed in a 1995 terrorist attack in Israel, where she was spending a study year. Applications are at www.alisafund.org. The deadline is Feb. 15.

Synagogue Attacked

PARIS — Assailants threw gasoline bombs and stones at a synagogue in suburban Paris. No one was injured, but the synagogue sustained minor damage in the Jan. 5 attack, which took place in the Paris suburb of Goussainville.

Neo-Nazi Jailed

STOCKHOLM — A Swedish neo-Nazi who published an anti-Semitic booklet was sentenced this month to six months in jail for violating Sweden's hate speech law. A Swedish court said the booklet, titled The Jewish Question, constituted "agitation against an ethnic group."

Death Sentence

ANKARA — A Turkish court has imposed the death sentence on two Turkish citizens responsible for the March 1992 murder of Ehud Sadan, the chief security officer at the Israeli embassy in Turkey. However, the death sentences are unlikely to be carried out, since Turkey has put a moratorium on executions. Sadan was killed after a bomb attached to his car was detonated. A group calling itself the Islamic Revenge Organization claimed responsibility, saying it was revenge for Israel's killing of Hezbollah secretary-general Abbas Musawi in Lebanon a month earlier.

Victim's Brother Fights Court Ruling

NEW YORK — The brother of the chassidic man killed in the 1991 Crown Heights riots said he will fight a decision that overturned the convictions of two men for violating the civil rights of victim Yankel Rosenbaum.

Norman Rosenbaum says he plans to fly to New York from his home in Melbourne, Australia soon. "I have a team of lawyers already in place to see what options are available," he said. Rosenbaum has made more than 100 trips to the United States to seek convictions for the killers.

An appeals court found last week that defendants Lemrick Nelson Jr. and Charles Price didn't get a fair trial because the judge in the case improperly allowed a potentially biased Jewish man onto the jury after the man said he didn't know if he could give a fair trial.

Nelson had been charged with Yankel Rosenbaum's murder and acquitted in a 1991 state trial.

Tourism in Jerusalem a British legacy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Feature

TORONTO — Israel can thank colonialist Britain for having helped develop the modern tourist industry in Jerusalem, an Israeli scholar claims.

During the British era in Palestine, Britain brought "new attitudes" to tourism and instituted procedures for preserving historical sites in the city and the country, said Kobi Cohen-Hattab.

Kobi Cohen-Hattab

Born and raised in Jerusalem, Cohen-Hattab recently completed a PhD in historical geography at the Hebrew University.

He wrote it under the supervision of Yehoshua Ben-Arieh of the Hebrew University and Yossi Katz of Bar Ilan University.

Cohen-Hattab plans to publish it as a book.

Cohen-Hattab, 36, has been in Toronto for the past six months under the auspices of the Israeli Association of Canadian Studies, Bar Ilan University, York University and the University of Toronto.

He is here to write a comparative study of Toronto and Tel Aviv under the impact of globalization and modernization.

In August, he plans to return to Israel to take up an academic post at Bar Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

Cohen-Hattab, whose European parents settled in Palestine in the 1930s, argues that British Mandate administrators gave tourism a great impetus by ensuring that holy places in Jerusalem would be preserved against the ravages of time.

Britain established a department of antiquities and passed laws designed to preserve sites such as the Western Wall, the Temple Mount and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Without these revolutionary measures, deteriorating holy sites may have fallen in a complete state of disrepair.

"The British had a tradition of preserving historical sites," he explained.

The previous Ottoman rulers had not been particularly interested in preservation, he added.

"They didn't really care."

During the mandate period, several major tourist attractions, including the Rockefeller Museum, the first archeological museum in Palestine, were unveiled.

Additional new attractions included The Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) building and the Hebrew University campus on Mount Scopus, both of which nurtured tourism, a major component of Palestine's economy.

Cohen-Hattab says that new hotels and pensions were constructed to accommodate the increased flow of tourists.

And in line with their plans to boost tourism – and to beautify Jerusalem – the British built parks and gardens.

By 1942, 24 such parks and gardens were scattered throughout the city.

From the 1920s onward, tourism in Palestine developed at a rapid pace.

Fifty thousand travellers, one-third of whom were Jewish, visited in 1925.

Within a decade, the figure had almost doubled.

Most tourists were Europeans and Americans, but a substantial proportion were Arabs from neighbouring countries.

Aside from Jerusalem, Palestine's chief tourist draws were Tel Aviv, Haifa, Tiberias, Safed and Megiddo.

Cohen-Hattab, who is here with his wife Michal– a lawyer – and three children, wants to talk to Canadians who visited Palestine during the British Mandate.

Article implied dual loyalty

I seldom comment on the coverage of Israel by other media outlets. There are simply too many other pressing subjects to which I prefer to devote this space. But there are occasional exceptions.

An article that appeared last week in the Globe and Mail was such an exception.

Offensive and insulting, it crossed the line. In my mind, it even raised questions about the motives of the Globe's editors.

Ostensibly, the story dealt with the attendance by six Jewish Canadian parliamentarians at a conference in Jerusalem for Jewish parliamentarians from around the world.

That the event should have warranted a story at all in the Globe and Mail is debatable. This was the sixth such annual gathering of Jewish parliamentarians; it was very similar to countless other such gatherings each year that bring Jews and others with common interests or backgrounds together in Jerusalem. Even if we concede for argument's sake that the story did have news value and was, therefore, legitimate, was placement of the story on page one warranted?

The placement, content and tone of the story were unquestionably problematic. They evoked in this reader, at least, great discomfort.

Implicit throughout the article was the suggestion that it was inherently inappropriate for these Jewish Canadian parliamentarians to attend the conference.

The lead paragraph set the tone. "An influential group of Canadian Liberal MPs led by Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, is lending its support to Israel (my emphasis) by attending a conference of Jewish politicians organized by the Israeli government."

And if they did "lend Israel support," was it wrong for them to do so? Is there any rule of morality or parliamentary obligation that prohibits them from supporting Israel?

"Ms. Caplan," the article continued, "said she sees no problem wearing 'two hats,' one as a Canadian minister and another as a supporter of Israel."

Why was this even an issue for the reporter?

Even if the reporter did not suggest the "two hats" terminology, and it came from Caplan herself, why was she put in the situation of having to defend her trip to Jerusalem? Whether the "two hats" terminology emanated from her or from the reporter, why was the concept even broached?

Like a bad odour that wafts across a clean, quiet ocean inlet, the implication in the lead of the story and in the quote from Caplan was unmistakable: these Jewish Canadian parliamentarians may have been in a conflict between their duties to Canada and their relationship to Israel.

To cast further doubt on the propriety of their behaviour, the story then attempted to raise concerns over the funding of the Canadians' participation: "The Israelis offered all participants five nights of free hotel accommodation during the conference... It was not clear in all cases... whether the Canadian MPs accepted that offer, or whether they are billing the Canadian government for other travel costs."

Either way, whether paid for by "the Israelis" or by the "Canadian government," the implication intended to jump out at the reader was again unmistakable: "the visiting politicians" were probably doing something wrong.

If the expenses were paid for by "the Israelis," the Canadians' integrity and independence were being compromised, as if "bought" by Israel. On the other hand, if the expenses were paid for by "the Canadian government," then Canadian taxpayers were being exploited.

But the story omitted to inform readers that the conference was the sixth of its kind, organized, arranged and sponsored by the Israeli Forum, a non-profit organization at arm's length from the Israeli government whose work strives to increase contacts between Israeli and Disapora Jews. It also omitted to inform readers that the government of Israel is only a marginal contributor to the funding of the forum; that the Canadians were there for valid public and private reasons; and that it was entirely appropriate for public or for private reasons that the Canadians attend the conference.

Given the presentation of the article, it was wholly reasonable to conclude that the Globe was whispering, if not openly proclaiming, dual loyalties on the part of the six parliamentarians.

The gratuitous and irrelevant reference to the conference in the following day's editorial about the 50 tons of intercepted PA-purchased armaments merely confirmed the reasonability of such a conclusion.

The article was an insult to the parliamentarians whose conduct was unfairly made the object of suspicion and scrutiny. It was also offensive to the vast majority of Canadians of all religious, ethnic and cultural affiliations who understand that the canard of dual loyalty is beneath contempt and a perniciously dangerous flag for the Globe and Mail to be raising in our free, tolerant, pluralistic, multicultural society.

New executive director sees United Synagogue as a family

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Denise Gold, the new executive director of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, considered the modern Orthodox synagogue of her childhood in Capetown, South Africa, a second home.

Her affiliation with the Conservative movement, however, is longstanding. A longtime member of Mercaz – which supports the Masorti movement, Conservative Judaism's Israeli arm – Gold felt an immediate affinity the first time she attended a Conservative service as a guest.

"What I liked was seeing the family sitting together as a family unit," she said in a recent interview at the office she shares with a staff of six. "I found that to be a warm, embracing atmosphere, and very conducive to praying together."

Gold is keeping that initial impression in mind as she settles into the position she took last November, replacing Shirley Gossack. (Gossack also served as youth director; Tamara Kochberg has assumed that role.)

"We're trying very hard to make that first impression of mine – as a family together – reality right now," said Gold, a mother of four and grandmother of nine.

"I look at all of us as being part of a huge family," she added. "I think that's the Jewish mother thing."

A high school English teacher by training, Gold has worked in the Jewish community since she immigrated in 1978. She has headed Israel Bonds Women's Division, worked in public relations and communication for B'nai Brith Canada, spent eight years at the Canadian Zionist Federation and most recently was with Canadian Friends of Boys Town.

Aside from her family, Gold's passion is Israel and all things Jewish, she said.

In her new position, Gold has already made a point of visiting and speaking with the rabbi of every congregation in her purview, which includes Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. (Canadian congregations west of Ontario tend to affiliate with geographically closer American regions.)

"We in this community are blessed with really good clergy," she said. Unfortunately, she noted, in terms of salary, particularly with the low value of the Canadian dollar relative to the American one, Canadian positions are less attractive from a financial point of view.

Gold's job entails working closely with member synagogues to provide programming and educational materials, and being the "conduit" for collaborative programs, she said.

Denise Gold

She said she is looking forward to meeting with the congregations and making a difference in terms of their programming.

United Synagogue's international office in New York has a cadre of professionals to help congregations with issues such as fund-raising, volunteer development and membership retention, she noted.

"I want to make United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism more relevant to our member congregations," she said, referring particularly to youth groups such as United Synagogue Youth (USY), and to smaller synagogues.

USY, which recently held its international convention in Washington, D.C. (attended by 28 youngsters from the Canadian region) is "a wonderful place for the young people to be able to mix in the milieu of a larger group than their own synagogue," Gold said. "I think that the whole experience of being part of synagogue youth is so positive because out of this come your future leaders."

When asked about a decline in certain USY chapters, Gold lauded Tamara Kochberg's recent youth work and said she expects "a significant change in the next year or so."

Other projects include finding new office premises before the current lease expires at the end of March.

Handler helps promote social justice

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mary Anne Handler, executive assistant at New Israel Fund (NIF), says it was fate that led her to her job.

When she was interviewed for the position about 1½ years ago, she discovered that she knew NIF's executive director, Minda Davis, from Congregation Darchei Noam where they both belong.

"There was an immediate connection," she says.

Spotlight

Handler, who had worked at Darchei Noam for three years before working for Israel's former trade commissioner in Toronto, says the synagogue was her "gateway" to the Jewish community.

She had been brought up Catholic, but converted to Judaism when she married her husband Willie, with whom she now has a teenage daughter.

Growing up, her parents – her father is Frank Bonello, director of central scouting for the National Hockey League and former coach and manager of the Toronto Marlboros – "taught her to respect everyone.

"My husband's parents are Holocaust survivors, and it was important to all of us that we bring up our children with one religion.

"When I began working at the synagogue, they welcomed me into the community. I really felt like I belonged. I never felt like I had to qualify my being Jewish," she says.

The New Israel Fund, which promotes equality and social justice for all Israelis, fosters values similar to her own, she says.

Mary Anne Handler

Her duties at the two-person office include donor communication, keeping track of donor records, and planning events such as the organization's annual Women's Voices evening.

"Last year we sponsored a photographic display – the photographer had been a survivor of the 1915 Armenian massacre – at the Koffler Centre featuring pictures of 1920s Jerusalem. Minda had met the photographer's son while visiting his photography shop in Israel, and arranged for the photographer's grandson to come and display part of the photos."

Since NIF's inception in 1979, it has granted more than $100 million to more than 600 non-profit organizations.

"We focus on populations that have been traditionally at a disadvantage – women, children, Arab citizens, Jews from Africa, new immigrants and non-Orthodox Jews.

"The nature of my job means that I am the first person donors speak to when they call the office. I get a lot of satisfaction from that."

What the organization does, she says, "is underscored by our events. People from the organization and from organizations that receive grants come and speak on behalf of NIF. People learn first-hand what we are all about."

A recent Women's Voices speaker was a Bedouin woman who spoke on the situation of Bedouin women in Israel.

"The donors are special people who care about the work of NIF. When I meet them face-to-face, I get a sense of accomplishment."

She says it is important to her to work in the Jewish community because it makes her feel more comfortable within the religion. "It is fate that brought me here and I feel I belong."

She and her husband are also actively involved with Darchei Noam where they have belonged for about seven years, and with their 16-year-old daughter's hockey team, which Handler manages and her husband coaches.

Visiting Israel has been on her "wish list" for a number of years, she says. "That is a high priority for our family."

Dry Bones

Caring and response: peoplehood's hallmarks

Over the past few weeks we have watched and read the news from Argentina with increasing alarm and deep worry. When banks refused depositors access to their own monies and rumours abounded of possible bank collapses, the thin veneer of civilization was easily scraped aside and the streets roiled with calamity and violence. The scenes were as frightening as they were ugly.

It is too early to tell whether the new government of Argentina has set a course that will extricate its people from the economic crisis and teetering social anarchy that exist there now. Many western observers, skeptical of the long-term soundness of the policy initiatives adopted by Argentina's president, Eduardo Duhalde, believe not.

That remains still to be seen.

We fervently hope however that a sufficiently long period of immediate calm will settle over Argentina to enable its people to step back from the brink and devise an appropriate plan back to economic and social stability.

Out of the dangerous tumult and dire times in Argentina, however, we have witnessed, again, an inspiring testament to the metaphysical bond of Jewish peoplehood. Throughout the Jewish world, Jewish communal organizations, relief agencies and advocacy groups are rallying to aid our fellow Jews in Argentina.

Peoplehood abjures indifference. Caring and response are peoplehood's hallmarks. And the sense of Jewish peoplehood, of the actual day-to-day, living manifestation of the millennial axiom kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh, all Israel bears a measure of responsibility one for the other, is a breathtakingly beautiful thing to behold. More importantly, it is a breathtakingly beautiful and moving thing in which to take part.

As reported in The CJN last week, the United Jewish Communities, essentially the network of Jewish federations of North America, has been active in Argentina for some time, helping where it could with subsidies and other assistance. So too have a myriad of other Jewish welfare and relief organizations in North America, Europe and Israel.

But the key "instrument of aid," for our co-religionists in Argentina is the State of Israel itself. For Jews around the world who feel vulnerable and set upon by dark and hostile forces, Israel is now a sanctuary and a haven for them, which, albeit not itself free from danger, will always seek to protect its citizens from any and all attempts to harm them. The Jewish Agency for Israel expects as many as 3,000 Jews from Argentina will settle in Israel this year. True to its mandate, it will assist them to do so.

By involvement in our own respective federations and other communal organizations, we can help the Jewish Agency and Israel provide that sanctuary to our Argentinian brethren. In years past, that idea of a sanctuary, always a fervent hope, was only a dream. Today, thank God, it is no mere dream; it is a promise.

Reader should learn history

I highly recommend that Andrea Kwavnick (Letters to the editor, CJN, Dec.13, 2001) read the book From Time Immemorial by Joan Peters. In it, she will discover that, contrary to the myth that "Palestinians had lived there [in Palestine] for centuries," there was actually a huge Arab migration into Israel after the Jews started cultivating and building there. That is why the United Nations found it necessary to define Arab refugees differently from any other refugees in the world. As opposed to other refugees, defined as people who are forced to leave "permanent" or "habitual" homes, in the case of Arab refugees, the definition included any persons who had been in "Palestine" for only two years (!) before 1948.

Knowledge of our history in Israel, including knowledge and acknowlegement of the Palestinian Jewish refugees as well as the Jewish refugees expelled from Arab lands, is crucial in order to obtain a truly just settlement in the Middle East.

Nothing should stop visits to Israel

Despite "the situation," we should not be deterred from visiting Israel. We should continue to be strong, support Israel and show solidarity. We should continue to organize peace rallies and sponsor trips such as the ever popular Birthright Israel. Nothing should stop us from travelling to the Jewish State and showing our pride in being Jewish. Am Yisrael Chai.

Objects to CJN's JDL coverage

I find it quite astounding that your account of the Los Angeles Jewish Defence League (JDL) plot to bomb a local mosque is buried in the Dec. 20 edition. Moreover, the article features an interview with a Canadian JDL leader who proposes that the entire incident was a (presumably Muslim) plot to distract attention from Muslim terrorism. I suppose that the cache of weapons found at the home of one of the JDL leaders was planted by Al Qaeda.

Just imagine if the shoe were on the other foot and a couple of Muslim militants were arrested for planning to bomb an Los Angeles synagogue. Where would that article appear? And would you feature an interview with a Canadian affiliate of these self-same Muslims eager to exonerate them by blaming the Jews for the synagogue bomb plot?

As a Canadian Jew, I am embarrassed that the newspaper that supposedly represents my community does so in such an outrageously biased fashion.

Criticizes government

While the State of Israel is afire from terrorist attacks, our government continues to endorse anti-Israel condemnations with regular frequency.

Religious fanatics of different sects – inflamed by hate-mongering Islamic clerics and by anti-Semitic radio and television broadcasts throughout the entire Arab world – carry out horrifying terrorist attacks against innocent Israeli civilians. The Arab world and its supporters endorse Palestinian violence as non-terrorist acts by freedom fighters and martyrs.

Western governments are wooing Arab countries for the anti-terrorism coalition, at the cost of Israel's security. When the Israeli army retaliates against Palestinian military installations, the soldiers are called terrorists.

Adding to the Kohl story

I was pleased to read the laudatory article by Eli Shupak in The CJN (Dec. 20, 2001) about my cousin, Sen. Herb Kohl. Your readers should be apprised of some additional information about Herb's Toronto connections and a small correction should be noted.

Herb and I did not grow up together in Milwaukee. I was raised in Chicago by my mother, Rachel Horowitz.

There are many other Kohl relatives in Toronto, such as Yetta Schatten, Nathan Arback, the late Manny Swadron and the late Abraham Kohl. Most of their children and grandchildren still live in Toronto and I was pleased to join the Canadian section of the Kohl family when my family and I came here. There is also a strong Israeli contingent of the family. We are always searching for more family members.

We are all proud of the achievements of Herb and his three siblings Sidney, Dolores and Allen. While their father, Max, did not live to see Herb become a respected political figure, his wife, Mary, was privileged to witness her son sworn in as a U.S. senator. At her funeral, one year ago, Herb offered a tribute to his parents, saying that they lived the (North) American dream. They came with few resources and built a successful business through hard work, good judgement and much mazal. They brought up their children to be good citizens, appreciative of the opportunities their country offered them, and guided by the Jewish ideals of care and justice for others. Being moral and modest was their creed.

Herb is privileged to carry it on in a public arena, but the entire family is committed to these principles.

The messiah controversy

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

"Our long-awaited messiah and redeemer arrived! Most Jews failed to recognize that he was the messiah, but we, his disciples, did. Tragically, he died before completing the redemptive process. But he will soon be resurrected and will continue and complete his messianic tasks."

Until just eight years ago, this profession of faith was easily recognizable. It was the distinctive formulation of the Christian credo. In an amazing development, a significant number of pious, Sabbath-observant, religious Jews – ostensibly "Orthodox" Jews – have now adopted this worldview and attempted to declare it kosher.

The death of one of the greatest rabbis of the 20th century, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn, the last Lubavitcher Rebbe, left the Lubavitch movement without any central, recognized authority. Rabbi Schneersohn had been an inspired and inspiring leader, who made Lubavitch, which used to be a small chassidic group, into a major player in the Jewish world. In the last years of his life, and especially after he suffered a stroke, many of his followers insisted that he was the long-awaited messiah, and that all Jews were obligated to recognize him in that role.

The rebbe groomed no successor. After his death in 1993, Jews all over the world, both friendly to Lubavitch and otherwise, wondered how the movement would cope. The movement has not had one unified reaction. No one in Lubavitch is openly looking for a new rebbe. "The rebbe" – Rabbi Schneersohn – is still the rebbe.

Judaism has known of movements centred around a dead rebbe. The Bratslever chassidic movement found no replacement for Rabbi Nachman after his death in the 19th century. That movement still flourishes (and its adherents are often called the toyte [dead] Chassidim). Messianic fervour about a living chassidic rebbe also has a few precedents in the last three centuries. But there is absolutely no precedent for Jews to continue to consider a person the messiah after his death. Before 1993, no Jew, other than a Jew for Jesus, affirmed that a specific individual who had initiated a messianic mission and then died in an unredeemed world was actually the messiah.

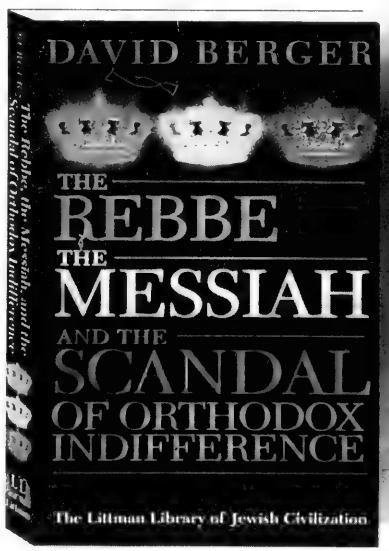
It is hard to know how many Lubavitchers actually believe that their dead rebbe is really the Messiah. But the number is significant. It includes a few of the more important rabbis in the Lubavitch movement in Canada.

A few years after the rebbe's death, a letter containing a psak halachah [religious ruling] appeared as a paid advertisement in many Jewish newspapers. Signed by a large number of rabbis associated with the Lubavitch movement, the letter stated that according to Halachah [Jewish law], all Jews were required to profess the belief that the late Rabbi Schneersohn was actually the Messiah.

The rebbe, it was claimed, was without doubt a prophet. The rebbe himself had confirmed (according to the letter) that he was the messiah. Since Halachah obligates Jews to believe the words of a prophet, every Jew was required to profess the belief that the rebbe was and still is the messiah.

Should the issue of the beliefs of a number of leaders (and an indeterminate number of followers) of the Lubavitch movement be of interest to those of us who are not Lubavitchers? According to David Berger, the answer is an unambiguous yes.

Berger is an Orthodox rabbi who is a professor of Jewish history at Brooklyn College in New York. He recently completed a term as president of the Association for Jewish Studies, one of the first Orthodox Jews ever to serve in that prestigious position. He is meticulously observant of Halachah, and is recognized around the world as a first-rate scholar. His area of specialization is the history of debates and polemics between Jews and Christians.



DAVID BERGER
THE REBBE THE MESSIAH AND THE SCANDAL OF ORTHODOX INDIFFERENCE
The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization

For the last few years, Berger has been on a tireless, and generally lonely, campaign against the legitimization of the Jewish belief in a dead messiah. He has been trying, with very limited success, to get leading Orthodox rabbis to speak out against this belief. He did have one impressive success in 1996 at the convention of the Rabbinical Council of America, the body to which virtually all modern Orthodox or centrist Orthodox rabbis belong. By an overwhelming majority, the rabbis at that convention passed a resolution reading: "In light of disturbing developments which have arisen in the Jewish community, the Rabbinical Council of America in convention assembled declares that there is not and has never been a place in Judaism for the belief that Mashiach ben David [the Messiah, son of David] will begin his messianic mission only to experience death, burial and resurrection before completing it."

Berger did not expect to sway Lubavitch opinion. He knew that he would be the object of a vilification campaign; his only surprise was the ferocity of the rhetoric about him in Lubavitch circles and publications.

But Berger did expect to have some success in isolating messianist Lubavitchers, or, at least, in convincing centrist Orthodox Jews that the messianist Lubavitch world view was a serious problem. This has not happened. Most Orthodox and non-Orthodox Jews smile condescendingly about this new messianism and don't get worked up about it. Berger feels that they should react more forcefully.

In September, he published an article in Commentary magazine in which he outlined his concerns, as a rabbi and as a scholar, about Lubavitch messianism. An expanded version of the article has just appeared as a book entitled The Messiah, the Rebbe and the Scandal of Orthodox Indifference (The Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2001). The book has caused quite a stir. Sales have been surprisingly high.

In his book, Berger presents two different but related arguments as to why Lubavitch messianism is dangerous. First of all, he says, it undermines the traditional Jewish argument that the belief in a dead messiah is a Christian, not a Jewish, one. Jews have always deflected Christian claims by offering that distinction. Today, evangelical Christians trying to convert Jews have started arguing that if kosher Jews can believe that the dead Rabbi Schneersohn is still the Messiah, why don't they give more credence to the claim that another Jew, who died around 2,000 years ago, is the real Messiah?

Berger's second argument is more complex and controversial. He argues (to my mind, convincingly) that the belief in a messiah who is dead and is about to be resurrected to finish his job carries the potential of blurring the distinction between humans and God to such an extent that it can lead to avodah zarah, that is, "foreign or non-monotheistic worhip." Berger cites some troubling statements in Lubavitch publications that lead us to believe that his concern is real, not, to be sure, about all Lubavitchers, and perhaps not about most. But, Berger argues, key Lubavitch educators in important positions have made statements that cannot be tolerated in a monotheistic religion.

How are we to relate to the claim that because the Rebbe is actually "the essence and being [of God] placed [areingeshtelt] into a body," he is without limits, capable of effecting anything, all-knowing and a proper object of worshipful prostration?

Berger's arguments are sufficiently complex that a one-page newspaper essay cannot do them justice. But I think that they are worthy of careful reading by all Jews, particularly here in Canada.

While most of the Lubavitch signatories on the psak halachah obligating Jews to profess the belief in the rebbe's messianism came from Israel and the former Soviet Union, there were also a number of Canadian rabbis, two of whom occupy influential and important positions in the wider Jewish communities of Toronto and Montreal.

Berger has issued a challenge to all non-Lubavitch Jews to re-examine – indeed, to oppose – the exercise of broad communal authority by anyone who was a signatory on the psak. He even suggests that non-Lubavitch Jews withhold their suppport from the specific institutions where the signatories occupy positions of authority.

Canadian Jews should give Berger's arguments a fair hearing and take them seriously. I have admired Berger for 27 years, ever since I was a student in two of his undergraduate Jewish history courses, one on messianism and one on Jewish-Christian polemics. He is a pious and committed Jew and a great scholar. Before 1993, I never heard him take an anti-Lubavitch or anti-chassidic position. In fact, he has always shown tolerance for all and a great respect for rabbis who are Torah scholars, even for those whose worldviews are not his. But he is also eager to preserve Jewish monotheism and Jewish identity by fighting against any blurring of the boundary between Judaism and Christianity.

Berger's campaign is not a quixotic crusade. It is a serious attempt to ask Jews of all denominations to think seriously about Jewish theology. Right here in Canada, Berger would say, serious changes have taken place in Judaism in the last eight years. How are we going to react?

Listening to Ruth Wisse

It was recently my privilege to listen to a lecture by Ruth Wisse, renowned historical analyst and professor at Harvard University.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Wisse described in detail the way in which Jews living in the Diaspora for 2,000 years were able to achieve a livable existence. We discovered the secret of adaptation and, according to the lecturer, this was – in varying shades and degrees – the common characteristic of our existence. We lived, after all, in other people's lands, and our security was dependent on their willingness to tolerate us and give us living space. Consequently, we developed an elaborate and effective system of adapting our needs to theirs, and in this compromise we managed to live in various lands under different rulers and conditions.

Ms. Wisse took us through a variety of centuries, illustrating her thesis with notable examples. After that, she turned to her main objective: an analysis of whether this historic strategy can apply today to the existence of the Jewish State.

We know, Ms. Wisse said, that the Diaspora strategy of adaptation cannot work, for the obvious reason that many Arabs who live in Israel as well as the neighbouring nations are not prepared to tolerate us and therefore make adaptation useless.

Translating this analysis into contemporary terms, Ms. Wisse proceeded to ask: what, then, is it that Israel must do? Her answer was as clear as it was simple: surrounded by nations who do not accept it and who find its existence illegitimate, adaptation is out of the question. Instead, Israel has learned that only its own strength and a strategy of self-defence will make its existence possible.

Is peace then out of the question? Israelis and Palestinians came close to it several years ago, when Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat negotiated at Camp David. Even the question of the return of refugees appeared to yield a mutually acceptable answer. But, for various reasons no treaty was signed; and at present, peace seems as far away as ever, especially since virulent anti-Judaism has raised its ugly head.

All of this makes the Jewish existence in the land of Israel different from Jewish existence in the historical Diaspora. Self-defence and strength now take the place of adaptation and accommodation and, unfortunately, this will have to be the strategy that Israel pursues as long as its neighbours and too many Palestinians deny the legitimacy of its existence.

Ruth Wisse mesmerized the large audience, and I – having heard her on various occasions – was spellbound by her clarity of thought and the cogency of her argument.

Bringing out the best in winter

Who can believe that it is already January? With the events that have occurred in the past few months, it is hard to believe how quickly time has passed. Since Sept. 11, we have all tried to move on and regain the momentum that was abruptly interrupted a few short months ago. By doing this, we have allowed ourselves to go about our daily lives in the most ordinary fashion possible.

Daccie Richler in Halifax

The winter break gives university students a time to relax for a short while and recharge ourselves for the upcoming semester. The unfortunate part is that we grow accustomed to this lovely time and forget that in the real world, one does not get a few weeks off after working very hard for four months. Getting back into the schedule is a challenge. After not seeing 7:30 a.m. for awhile, I am not looking forward to the Monday morning when the awful noise of an alarm clock will invade my sleep. On the other hand, January gets us closer to an exciting time for Jewish university students and young people in the Atlantic region.

Through the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student's Federation (APJSF), university students will have the opportunity to go on their annual weekend retreat, from Feb. 1 to 3. Attendees will be able to discuss pertinent world issues, network with other students and ski to their hearts' content. Especially entertaining for students are the change of scenery and large quantities of food. The informal weekend leaves the participants with a warm, fuzzy feeling.

The youth of the Atlantic region will again have a chance to bond together as they embark on their annual Shabbaton ski trip, Feb. 8 to 10, at a resort in Wolfville, N.S. Last year's trip had more than 60 participants and it is expected that the number will increase this year. The success of the trip depends on the people involved. While I cannot form opinions on other youth groups, I have to say that the kids active in the Atlantic region are a fantastic bunch. They are innovative and bright and make this kind of weekend memorable.

Shabbatons like this enable youths from small communities to get together and take part in a variety of programs. For some kids, this is the only contact they have with other Jewish youth during the year; for others, it is a reunion from their summers at Camp Kadimah. Things like having a large group for an oneg Shabbat are perhaps taken for granted in larger Jewish centres, but at our Shabbaton, we appreciate them that much more. We also make sure to have the right mixture of programming, with plenty of time to go swimming and skiing and to eat (the marathon goes on all weekend).

While the post-Shabbat skiing might be a draw for the weekend, participants spend much of their time discussing Israeli politics and Jewish philosophy, and of course, just hanging out and making memories. As an Atlantic Jewish Council staff member assigned to the trip last year, I enjoyed seeing how well everyone worked together.

This year's Shabbaton will centre on the theme of humanitarianism. We are working on a program with Ve'ahavta to discuss and learn about how to give back to our communities. No doubt the weekend will provide stimulating conversation and activity. As well, I am sure that the participants will stay up late (much later than they should!) to catch up on what's going on in their lives and have a fantastic time.

Thankfully, the Atlantic Jewish Council takes a strong stance in ensuring that the youth and students are provided with such programs and it pays off. With times being a little more fragile, it gives young people a chance to relax but also to communicate for a few days. For information about APJSF, please contact apjsf@hotmail.com and for youth programming, ajcyouth programs@hotmail.com.

Israel's passive war

When we think of war in Israel we recall the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War, or the War of Independence. There is one war however that many people don't associate with Israel, a war where the IDF was on guard, but not fighting. Calling it a passive war could be an appropriate description. But everyone however knows this war by its more common name: the Gulf War.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Jan. 17 marks the first day that America dropped bombs on Iraq in 1991 and the beginning of fear in the land of Israel. If anyone is unfamiliar with Israel's involvement in the Gulf War, the story goes like this: Iraq sent Scud missiles into Israel, and America told Israel not to retaliate, so it didn't. While Iraq rained bombs on the Holy Land, Israel sat idly by wondering what would happen next as the United States fought its war against Iraq.

One of teachers at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC), the Jewish high school in Winnipeg, was in the IDF during the Gulf War. Talking to her about the war was fascinating. Like so many others, I didn't realize the impact the Gulf War had on Israel. After talking to her, I have gained a very fresh perspective on the conflict.

If you were to sum up in one word what many Israelis felt during the war it would be fear. The fear of the unknown, the fear of being killed by a missile, a fear of life never being able to go on. Israelis did not know where or when the next siren would blast, which caused panic and stress. This teacher recalled a time when three sirens went off during one night. After people realized the first attack was over, they would try and go back to bed, only to be awakened by another siren, and so on.

While destruction from missiles was a fear for Israelis, the fact that these Scuds could have been filled with chemicals shocked people.

The JWC teacher was one of the people in the IDF who had to teach people how to use the "kits," as they called them, used to protect against potential chemical-weapons attacks. She had to show the parts of a gas mask, how to put it on and to make sure people used it correctly.

Many Israelis had never seen one of these haunting and intimidating masks before or at least have never thought they would ever need to wear one. Imagine a siren blasting and being forced to run into a room you had sealed off and then putting a black alien-looking gas mask on your child. This was the psychological trauma facing many Israelis at the time.

To top it off, Israelis could not fight back. Israel is proud of its army and its victories. Having to wait in peril, trusting another country to fight its battles was very difficult for many Israelis to accept.

But with all the fear and anxiety came miracles. The Gulf War reminds me of stories from the Bible. Stories where the Jews were being persecuted and somehow the Red Sea parted or the sun stood still. While entire neighbourhoods were wiped out by missiles, only two people were directly killed by missile attacks. The war could have had devastating casualties, but for some unexplainable reason, there were only a small number of deaths.

Many people may not be aware of this, but – and this too makes me scratch my head in amazement – the festival of Purim fell the day after the Gulf War ended. People all over Israel traded in their gas masks for their Purim masks and danced all night in the streets celebrating the day Jews stopped being the target of annihilation.

Before I spoke with this teacher I would have never considered the Gulf War to be an Israeli war, but now I realize that this passive war had a profound impact on the people of Israel and helped shape the country we know today.

Jews navigate Brazil's multiracial society

Jews have prospered in Brazil, a nation that has successfully integrated immigrants from all corners of the world into its rainbow-hued multiracial society.

As Marcelo Kozmhinsky, the administrative director of Recife's only Jewish day school, the Colegio Israelita Moyses Chvarts, put it: "Brazil is an assimilationist society, welcoming all groups."

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

Henry Sobel, the senior rabbi of Sao Paulo's Congregacao Israeli Paulista, agrees. "There is more tolerance and respect for differences in Brazil than in any other country in Latin America."

Anti-Semitism, to be sure, exists. But is is latent, an extremely minor factor in everyday life, and the Brazilian constitution imposes a mandatory prison sentence, with no possibility of bail, on public expressions of religious or racial prejudice.

Brazil's multiracialism is not merely a slogan. Interracial mingling has marked, and continues to mark, this immense country, which, with a population of 175 million, is only slightly smaller than the United States.

As a result, the Jewish intermarriage rate is high, having reached at least 60 percent.

Silvio Santos – the owner of Brazil's second largest television station, SBT, and one of the most prominent members of the Jewish community – typifies, in some respects, what is happening in Brazil today. Having married out of the faith, he has raised his children as Catholics, while contributing generously to Jewish causes.

Rabbi Henry Sobel

Boris Berenstein, an amiable 51-year-old radiologist from Recife, is another exemplar of the easy-going, laissez-faire attitude of many Jews toward intermarriage. The president of the Jewish state federation, the Federacao Israelita de Pernambuco, he has been married twice, in both instances to non-Jews. His current wife, a Catholic with whom he has had two children, has not converted to Judaism. Nor does she plan to convert after 15 years of marriage. But unlike Santos, Berenstein, whose east European parents settled in Brazil after World War II, has brought up his children as Jews.

To the probable chagrin of Recife's only rabbi, Alex Mizrachi, a 27-year-old Chabadnik who looks totally out of place here, Berenstein identifies with Jewishness through Zionism rather than religion.

In a country like Brazil, where the melting pot philosophy is strong and alluring, Berenstein is hardly alone. Anete Hulak, who at 98 is supposedly Recife's oldest living Jewish person, a Romanian immigrant who has lived in Brazil since the late 1920s, acknowledged that her grandchildren celebrate Jewish and Christian holidays. Her sons are married to Catholic women who did not convert to Judaism.

Itiel Genes, Hulak's 73-year-old relative, a man who was born in Natal of Bessarabian parents, tells a similar story. His daughters wed Catholics, and he does not expect his grandchildren to marry Jews. "It's not practical," he said, referring to the scarcity of Jewish marriage partners in Recife's small Jewish community of 450 families.

To Eitan Surkis, Israel's consul general in Rio, assimilation is the Jewish community's primary challenge. The Israeli government, through specially designed trips to Israel, tries to bolster the Jewish identity of Brazilian Jewish teenagers. "But costs are a problem," he admitted.

Sheldon Kirshner Photos

Rabbi Sergio Margulis

Rabbi Sobel, whose congregation is Brazil's largest, said that assimilation, rather than anti-Semitism, is "the most serious threat" facing the community. "My goal," he explained, "is to make Jews more Jewish and to raise the level of Jewish consciousness."

There are two distinct trends in the community, he noted.

"There is a small but significant core of Brazilian Jews who are becoming more religious, more aware of their Jewishness. This core spans the entire spectrum of Jewish movements: Liberal and Orthodox and Reform and Chabad. On the periphery, however, is an equally significant number of Jews who are abandoning their religion, leaving themselves and their children without Jewish identity. We are like a large corporation with two divisions: one prosperous, vibrant and dynamic; the other on the verge of bankruptcy and threatening to sink the entire enterprise."

Partly because of such developments, the community has remained stagnant demographically. When Rabbi Sobel immigrated to Brazil from New York City in 1970, the size of the community was the same as it is today: approximately 130,000.

Marcelo Kozmhinsky

"Jews do not want to flock to Brazil," he observed, saying that Soviet Jewish immigrants have all but avoided the country. "Latin America is not a stable continent, politically and economically."

And, as Surkis pointed out, 250 to 300 Jews, on average, make aliyah every year. Still others have resettled in Miami, said Rabbi Nilton Bonder of Congregacao Judaica Do Brasil, a Conservative synagogue in the upscale Rio suburb of Barra da Tijuca.

Frequent though intermarriages may be, it is debatable whether they are really gutting the community irretrievably: The non-Jewish partner often converts in such unions. Rabbi Sergio Margulis of Temple Ari, a liberal shul founded 60 years ago by German immigrants, performs some conversions in the Atlantic Ocean. "It's a blessing we have in Rio," said the 39-year-old rabbi, whose parents hail from Poland.

Even when the non-Jewish spouse refrains from converting to Judaism, all is not lost. Take, for example, the case of Fabio Oliveira. A single 31-year-old marketing manager from Porto de Galinhas, a charming seaside resort one hour by car from Recife, Oliveira is half-Jewish, but halachically non-Jewish.

Nonetheless, he considers himself Jewish. "I respect the concepts and ideas in Judaism," he said. Oliveira wears a ring with an embossed Magen David and keeps a laminated Hebrew prayer book in his pocket.

As Surkis suggested, the impoverishment of middle-class Jews – a fairly recent phenomenon in Brazil triggered by a sluggish economy and a lagging currency – may be causing as much alienation from the organized Jewish community as intermarriage.

"More and more of our congregants need financial assistance to pay their dues," disclosed Rabbi Sobel. "We are investing more money in social action programs."

Avraham Shamir, a Jewish Agency representative posted to Rio's Bar-Ilan School, an Orthodox institution, said that more than half its students depend on scholarships.

"More Jews are in need of social assistance and food," said Jackson Grossman of Rio's Jewish federation.

"Inflation, in recent years, has wiped out some Jewish wealth," noted Rabbi Bonder, a graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. "We've had situations in which bar mitzvahs and synagogue memberships have been cancelled."

Despite such problems, Brazil's Jewish community remains vibrant. "Jewish history has proven over and over again that our survival instinct is powerful and capable of defeating all odds," said Rabbi Sobel. "Which is why I trust that, in 25 years from now, we will have not only survived, but will have undergone a surprising renaissance."

Israel-Brazil relations

Israel's bilateral relationship with Brazil is on an even keel, despite the lashing Israel has absorbed in the Brazilian media since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000. "In general, our relations are very good, though there is always room for improvement," said Israel's consul general in Rio de Janeiro, Eitan Surkis.

Israel, with an embassy in Brasilia and another consulate in Sao Paulo, has maintained diplomatic relations with Brazil since 1949. Brazil voted for the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan.

The annual volume of Israeli-Brazilian trade is about $300 million (US), with machinery, chemicals, coffee and meat being the main export/import items. There are also lively cultural ties. The Israel Philharmonic was here on a tour recently. Israel has a military attache in Brasilia, but Surkis disclaimed knowledge of Israeli arms sales to Brazil.

Though officially neutral in the Arab-Israeli dispute, Brazil usually supports UN resolutions calling for Israel's withdrawal from the territories. In 1975, when Brazil was dependent on Arab oil, it supported the UN Zionism-is-racism resolution.

Thousands of Brazilian Jews have made aliyah since 1948, and Kibbutz Givat Oz was settled by Brazilians.

The Committee for Yiddish, UJA Federation, the Kulturgezelshaft, and the Friends of Yiddish express their deep sorrow at the sudden passing of their friend and colleague, the talented and tireless Yiddishist

Jewish Life

Goldwin Smith, historical puzzle

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A historical puzzle: Why did Goldwin Smith, the foremost literary personality of 19th-century English Canada and a staunch anti-Semite, attend the opening of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple on Bond Street in 1897? And why, despite his outspoken enmity towards the Jews, did he contribute to Holy Blossom's building fund, as congregational records show?

Roots & Remembrance

If Smith's achievements as a pre-eminent man of letters are beyond question, so, too, are his credentials as a Jew-hater. Born in Britain in 1823, he received an impeccable Victorian education that included Greek and Latin. As an Oxford professor in the 1850s, he won acclaim for championing major university reforms and thereafter participated fully in the country's political and literary life. In Toronto in 1875, he married the widow Harriet Boulton and moved into the Grange, the city's most venerable address, where he lived until his death in 1910.

Nicknamed the "sage of the Grange," Smith wrote on many public issues for many local newspapers and journals; his byline was equally well known in New York and London. He was "the dominant intellectual force in the city for 40 years," writes Greg Gatenby in Toronto: A Literary Guide.

Smith's numerous articles on "the Jewish question" include an essay by that title that appeared in the North American Review in August 1881, as a wave of anti-Jewish violence swept across Russia.

Smith described the pogroms as both justified and inevitable. He presented himself as a tolerant liberal who felt compelled to condemn a singularly objectionable and "parasitic" race. He wrote as if everything he knew about the Jews had come from The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Without paying more attention to his odious opinions than they merit, we must still be grateful to him for inspiring the powerful and thoughtful response, by one Isaac Besht Bendavid, that appeared in the North American Review in September 1881.

The pseudonymous Bendavid wielded his pen like a skilled swordsman. He refuted each of Smith's main points so adeptly that he must have left readers wondering, "Who is this masked man?" even as he receded like an elegant Jewish Zorro into the mists of history.

Smith's animosity towards the Jews was likely inflamed by a deeply-felt literary jibe he had received from Benjamin Disraeli, Britain's distinguished novel-writing prime minister.

Disraeli, who had been born Jewish but had converted, had ridiculed Smith in Lothair, his roman-a-clef novel of 1871. Lothair presented a fictitious, ridiculous Oxford professor, described as a "wild man of the cloisters" and a "social parasite"; the identification with Smith was widespread. Smith retained a lifelong grudge against Disraeli, and apparently railed often and bitterly against him, even long after his death.

No matter how nicely expressed, Smith's opinions on many subjects – for instance, his support for the annexation of Canada to the United States – were often contentious. Like many people in that era, he seemed to view history as a series of defining contests between races; he was convinced that the political union of "the two English-speaking races" of North America was both mutually advantageous and inevitable.

Outwardly cold, he was often characterized as a lonely and angry man, all brain and no heart. Yet his servants adored him and observed that he would cheerfully take a hard seat rather than disturb a kitten asleep on his favourite armchair. He also marched under Protestant banners in Orange Day parades and was plainly prejudiced against Catholics but supported the St. St. Vincent de Paul Society, a Catholic charity. Clearly, he was a man of contradictions.

Talking with Wiesel

Elie Wiesel's arm bears the concentration camp number A7713. At 73, he sees himself not as an essayist or novelist in the accepted contemporary vein, but as a vehicle, a conduit, a messenger.

Books
Bernard Baskin

But this was not always the case. When he was liberated from Buchenwald as a young man, he vowed that he would not speak or write of his experiences for at least 10 years.

Working in Paris as a journalist for an Israeli newspaper, Wiesel interviewed author François Mauriac, a devout Christian and Nobel Prize winner. Mauriac spoke about Jesus and Wiesel said to him, "Ten years ago, I knew hundreds of Jewish children who suffered more than Jesus did and no one talks about it."

Mauriac wept and said, "You should talk about it."

That moved Wiesel more than anything else and opened an eloquent channel of communication about the once incommunicable.

Yet, speaking of the 30 or more books he has written, Wiesel confesses that, in his opinion, every one has been a failure. He feels a sense of inadequacy but a compulsion to write. He says he owes it to the dead as well as to the living.

The book under review is a far-ranging, open and lively dialogue with Wiesel on some of the major issues of our time. The probing questions are posed by Richard Heffner, a noted television moderator and university professor. Wiesel's responses to the questions are, not unexpectedly, forthright, honest and stimulating.

On being asked about the return of Palestinian refugees to Israel, Wiesel wonders, "Why shouldn't we mention, then, the three million Germans who were expelled from the Czech Republic in 1945? How can anyone suggest that they all go back to the Sudeten? It's impossible. How about Pakistan and India? Would anyone mention bringing those people back? It would be a tragedy. I don't like to compare sufferings, but what about the Jews who were expelled from Arab countries? Once you start comparing tragedies, it's a problem."

What form of religion is desirable? For Wiesel, it must be a humanizing experience. "Unfortunately, fanaticism and religion have gone hand in hand for too long. I'm afraid of that. Once you believe that whatever you do you do in the name of a higher power, that you do it for the sake of God, it's dangerous."

In discussing the astonishing advances in modern communication, Wiesel points out that Plato, Buddha, Jeremiah and Lao-Tze were near contemporaries but did not know about one another. "So imagine if you could bring them together before a television camera. If we had such a program, what it would do for humankind! Now we can do that. You can bring together scholars, poets and scientists from all the horizons, all the spheres, and establish an exchange, a dialogue, a multi-dialogue. It's possible and beneficial."

Wiesel also touches on many other subjects, including the role of the state in our lives, the anatomy of hate, the threat of technology, the danger of nationalism and the need for compassion and mercy.

When he received the Nobel Prize for Peace, Wiesel suggested that one person of integrity – a Raoul Wallenberg, an Albert Schweitzer, a Martin Luther King – can make the difference between life and death. For many of his admirers, Elie Wiesel is just such an individual.

Jewish Life

Bar/bat mitzvahs on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's the biggest day in a young Jewish girl or boy's life: the day when they become responsible for their actions and inch a bit closer toward adulthood. The whole event can be quite nerve-racking, but there's a great deal of marvelous advice on the Internet for the bar and bat mitzvah – and their parents. Today, as one of Web site so eloquently puts it, a look at the "Sites of Passage" [http://www.jewishjournal.com/archive/08.11.00/].

There is no direct commandment in the Torah to celebrate a bar mitzvah. However, Genesis 21:8 does mention that Abraham made a great party for Isaac on the day that he was weaned [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd4.asp?action=displaypage&book=1&chapter=21&verse=8&portion=4]. One commentator suggests that Isaac was 13 [http://www.milknhoney.co.il/torah/barmit_history.html]. In Pirkei Avot 5:21 (the Ethics of our Fathers), we are instructed that 13 is the proper age for the fulfillment of the Commandments, 18 for marriage and 20 for earning a livelihood [http://www.ou.org/pdf/lalavot4.pdf]. The age of 13 does not make a child into a full adult, but by that age a child is responsible for his or her actions [http://www.ahavat-israel.com/ahavat/torat/barmitzva.asp].

The Judaism 101 site gives a good primer to the celebration and its history. It points out that in Orthodox practice, girls and women are not called up to the Torah, while in other movements of Judaism, the girls do exactly the same thing as the boys. It also explains that you don't really have to do anything to become a bat or bar mitzvah, that it happens automatically when you turn 12 or 13 [http://www.jewfaq.org/barmitz.htm].

The bar mitzvah ceremony is associated with many traditions that we now take for granted. The Milk'n'honey Web site explains the origins of being called up to the Torah, having a great feast and making a speech. The site also makes it clear that our traditions are not universal and that other Jewish communities have done things differently:

"The Syrian community has a custom that on the day of the bar mitzvah [before he is thirteen] when the boy puts on his Tefillin all of the close relatives, rabbis and friends each wrap the Tefillin once around the arm" [http://www.milknhoney.co.il/torah/bar mit_history.html].

Lubavitchers also have some unique traditions that you can see at their Web site. It also has a wonderful guide to the laying of Tefillin [http://www.sichosinenglish.org/books/bar-mitzvah/].

It is beyond the scope of this article to survey the many varieties of bar and bat mitzvah planning software, preparation tools, learning aids and commercial services that can be purchased through the Internet. The best way to find these is to go to a search engine like Google and type in the words "bar mitzvah" [http://www.google.com]. Another excellent resource is the Maven Search web directory [http://maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=116].

There are many thoughtful sites that are geared toward the decisions faced by parents as the big day nears such as choosing the proper invitation. When Anita Diamant began planning her daughter's bat mitzvah, she became an amateur social anthropologist.

"Every invitation contains clues about the nature of each and every family – not just evidence of divorces and income levels, but hints about values, beliefs, and even child-rearing styles," Diamant says. "Extra-thick card stock and the words 'black tie optional' certainly advertise robust financial health... The complete absence of Hebrew or Jewish words or images [hearts instead of six-pointed stars] hints at distance from, or at least ambivalence toward, Jewish tradition." The sin of naivete

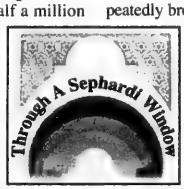
By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

On display were row upon row of weaponry: machine guns, mines, mortars, Katyusha rockets, grenades, AK-47 rifles, as well as half a million rounds of ammunition for various guns, all confiscated by Israel in the open seas as they made their way to the Palestinian Authority (PA). In all, 50 tons of raw military hardware were on this "ship of terror," worth some $160 million – weapons in whose lethal range would be every life on every inch of Israeli territory.



Quickly, that bastion of honesty and integrity, Mr. Yasser Arafat, professed his innocence and distanced himself and the PA by saying it "condemns this operation and condemns the Israeli attempt to accuse the Palestinian Authority of being involved in this."

Apparently, every time one thinks Arafat's capacity for duplicity has reached its zenith, he manages to show us how wrong we are; he is still capable of new heights.

Of course, this all is very old news. This is, after all, the same man who repeatedly broke every agreement and understanding between himself and his benefactors. First, when he was hosted in Jordan, then in Lebanon and then in Tunis, only to get himself and his cohorts unceremoniously expelled from each country. This is the same man who betrayed Saudi Arabia by siding with Iraq after having been lavishly supported by Saudis. This is the very man who implores the world for help, calling on them to stop Israeli aggression and begging for his impoverished people while cynically spending fortunes of their money for his own arsenal of terror.

As gratifying as it was to hear Prime Minister Ariel Sharon graduating Arafat from "irrelevant" to "our bitter enemy," it is painful to see that delusion and naivete are still plaguing others.

We read as well the words of a former Israeli cabinet minister, Yosi Sarid: "This ship could sink everything. The peace camp in Israel is always asked whether it has a partner on the Palestinian side. Mr. Arafat's trustworthiness is in question and must now be proven."

Evidently, someone like Mr. Sarid still has questions and harbours misgivings, indeed to the point of extending to Arafat the benefit of the doubt with the request that he – Arafat – prove his own trustworthiness.

Righteousness or goodness should never be confused with being naïve. Wisdom is the guide of the righteous; foolishness is the creed of the naïve. One seriously wonders what virtue some may see in Arafat to prompt them to accord him this courtesy. Arafat's actions make him what he is. Not his words.

It is the epitome of naivete (read irresponsibility) to rely on the word of someone like him when considering the safety of the people of Israel in the land of Israel.

Mekorot Institute gets ready for winter session

Women increasingly participating in advanced Torah study

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, a text-based program of serious Jewish learning, will begin its winter semester on Feb. 4. The term will end on May 30, with a break for Pesach.

Full-time courses include Joseph's Rise to Power and his Reunification with His Brothers taught by educator, lecturer and writer Shoshana Zolty; and The Book of Joshua: Challenges, Leadership and Conquest taught by Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Zolty's course will be offered on Tuesday evenings at Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation, and on Wednesday mornings at Shaarei Shomayim. Rabbi Shulman's course will be on Thursday mornings at Chabad Lubavitch @ Flamingo.

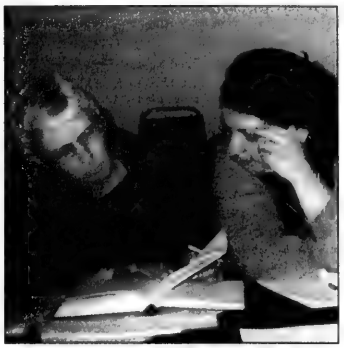
A course in basic Talmud will be taught at Clanton Park Synagogue on Monday mornings.

There are also a number of three- or four-week mini-courses. Zolty will present a course on the origin and significance of Midrash, and Eric Lawee, a professor at York University and author of a soon-to-be published book Isaac Abarbanel's Stance Towards Tradition: Defence, Dissent and Dialogue, will teach Lo Bashamayim: authority and innovation in Jewish Law, Sundays in February at Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Lawee's course is open to both men and women.

A new learning opportunity is being called Mekorot Downtown Brownbag Seminar, and will be held on Feb. 6, 13 and 20 at the offices of Heenan Blaikie, at the Royal Bank Plaza at Bay and Front. The topic will be Esther: the Scroll and Exile and the Dawn of Redemption, taught by Hilda Weil.

Janice Rotman-Goldstein, secretary and a founder of Mekorot, said that it was founded in May 1999 by a group of women who had previously attended programs in Israel such as Nishmat Matan or Midreshet Lindenbaum, Drisha in New York, or Mayaan in Boston.



Chevruta learning at Mekorot.

The idea was to do text-based learning which involves studying and discussing the original texts rather than discussing commentaries on them.

"It's like a conversation over the millennia between you and the Rambam or the Sfas Emes."

This is how men have studied for centuries, she said. She compared non- text-based studying to learning Shakespeare through Coles notes, without ever seeing a live performance of one of his plays.

Women are increasingly becoming involved with advanced Torah study, Rotman-Goldstein said, and also "want to struggle with the text and deal with it."

She studied at Matan, a similar type of program in Jerusalem. The experience was "electric," she said. "You are sitting with women from across the spectrum of age, religious practice and educational background."

Torah becomes personal, she said. "It's how you are supposed to absorb Torah."

Rotman-Goldstein is passionate not only about Mekorot, but about serious study for women in general. It is women who will ensure the continuity of Judaism, she said.

Mekorot enrollment has almost doubled since the first semester, she said, and includes students of three generations, from those wearing sheitls to those in pants, and from Reform to Orthodox, she said. Besides classes, students have the option of chevrutah (paired) learning.

Mekorot also brings in eminent women scholars to lecture, Rotman-Goldstein said. "There are brilliant women Torah scholars, and we want to bring [established ones] from outside the city, and also encourage those coming up."

'Mr. Borochov' dies at 82

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Newman, well known in the Jewish community as Mr. Borochov, died recently at age 82.

Obituary

Newman, who was born in Chmelnik, Poland, joined the Borochov Centre shortly after immigrating to Canada with his wife Anna in 1951, and was one of the founders of Kol Yisrael Synagogue, located in the centre.

He served as synagogue president and chazzan, and led services right up until his recent illness.

"Next to my mother, his first love was Yiddish," said daughter Gloria Block.

She told the 800 people who attended the funeral service that when his family moved to Lodz in 1935 after his mother died, they lived with a family who set up a table in their two-room home so he could earn a living teaching Yiddish culture and Jewish history.

He saw his father and three sisters for the last time in 1942 when they were sent to different concentration camps.

"It was in Buchenwald that my father risked his life teaching Yiddish to children," Block said.

In the 1950s he appeared in the Yiddish Vaudeville Theatre on Spadina Avenue and over the years worked as a Polish and Yiddish translator for the court system, she said.

Her father often spoke to students, both Jewish and non-Jewish about the Holocaust because he wanted them to know what it was really about, said Block.

"It was important to him to share his experiences and to make sure they know it is not just a story."

He also taught Yiddish classes and because of his "deep commitment to Israel" spent a lot of time fund-raising for State of Israel Bonds and UJA Federation.

He was chair of the Labour Zionist Alliance, and a longtime member of the Yiddish Cultural Council where he served as chair for the past nine or 10 years.

Newman's grandson, Eli Newman, said his grandfather's Yiddish classes meant a lot to him, and he was determined to finish the recent term. "At his classes, he told Yiddish jokes and anecdotes and talked about his family. People took his classes for years, but learning Yiddish was secondary. They went to see Zaide."

Newman also remembered his grandfather for his jokes, he said. "He would tell me he had to get a haircut, but he did not know which one to cut."

David Newman

Simcha Simchovitch, a friend for about 40 years and a fellow member of the Yiddish Cultural Council said he saw Newman the week before he died and his friend remained cheerful, optimistic and young looking. "He was loved by a lot of people."

People often turned to her father to speak at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs or funerals, Block said. "Some approached him when they became ill and asked him to deliver the eulogy at their funeral.

"Even in the worst of times, his upbeat personality was a comfort to those around him. He found only the good in people," she said.

In addition to Anna to whom he was married for 56 years, Gloria and Eli, Newman leaves a son Jack, and four other grandchildren, Lauren, Kate, Jodi and Carly.

Restaurateur's hallmarks were smile, friendly greetings

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Herman Ladovsky, restaurateur par excellence, whose hallmark smile and friendly greetings to patrons at United Bakers, many of whom became friends and part of his extended family, died Jan. 6. He was 89.

Obituary

Now in its third generation, United Bakers Dairy Restaurant has been an important landmark in the history and growth of the Jewish community in Toronto. Ladovsky's heimishe hospitality, friendly shmoozing with customers and zest for life have left an indelible imprint on the family restaurant.

Ladovsky and his twin brother Sam were born Sept. 23, 1912, the year their parents Aaron and Sara Ladovsky, immigrants from Kielce, Poland, and opened their first bakery and cafe at Agnes and Teraulay Streets, now Dundas and Bay Streets.

They moved to 338 Spadina Ave., just north of Dundas, once the centre of Jewish life in Toronto, and from 1920 on, the dairy restaurant provided a social, business, cultural and political forum for people from all walks of life, and a meeting place for people from all parts of the globe.

Ladovsky grew up working in the business and lived with his family above the store. After a stint overseas during World War II, he returned to the business. He became the owner-operator when his father retired in 1955. In the Ladovsky tradition, his children, Philip and Ruthie, were beside him growing into the business.

When the Spadina restaurant closed in 1986 and relocated in Lawrence Plaza, Ladovsky turned the operating tasks over to them.

But almost every day, Ladovsky, who became the ambassador of goodwill, could be seen at United Bakers, stopping to chat and spread his warmth and friendship.

In his eulogy to his father, Philip Ladovsky said, "He lived his life filled with love and compassion, which he gave naturally and abundantly to all of us, and he died in the arms of his family, giving him back just what he had always given to us."

Ladovsky is survived by his wife and best friend Dora; children Simmy, Ruthie and Moe, Philip and Caryn; and grandchildren Rhonda and Rob, Brian, Nathan, Jacob and Adam.

Israel Week just around the corner

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With Israel Week around the corner, Nikki Greenspan, president of JSF, the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University, is happy to report that "things have settled down" on her campus.

In late November, Greenspan told The CJN that Jewish students had been subjected to anti-Semitic and anti-Israel comments by non-Jewish students, and that there was anti-Semitic graffiti in an elevator. She also said that some students didn't feel comfortable wearing a Magen David or a kippah.

"People seem to be working together," Greenspan said. As an example, she noted that when Israel Week was announced at York's recent Interfaith Council meeting, reaction was very positive. She is the JSF's representative to the council. The Muslim student association had two representatives at the meeting, she said.

The council is working on a joint project, she said.

Israel Week, an annual event, is being held next week at York University and the University of Toronto concurrently.

"We're trying to stay away from anything political," said Jaime Walman, JSF's program director at York.

She noted that the "intent in bringing [speakers Itamar Marcus of Palestinian Media Watch and aliyah shaliach Gadi Anavi] was not political. They are coming to bring us information and give us an update."

An Israel display is being organized at the campus' Bear Pit (Central Square) all week, along with a falafel stand. The food will be provided by York's new kosher restaurant, Joe Schmoe's, which opened in November.

Displays will depict cultural, geographical, travel, social and historical aspects of Israel, said Walman.

A live song and dance performance will be held Monday at 4:30, and Tuesday evening will include Hebrew slang and Jewish history lessons.

The University of Toronto's Israel Week also includes a talk by Marcus, along with talks on Israel's water crisis and the UN-sponsored conference on racism held last summer in Durban. There will also be an Israel Day display at the Sidney Smith building Jan. 21.

For further information, go to www.yorku.ca/jsf or http://jsu.sa.utoronto.ca.

Students raising funds for project in El Salvador

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ryann Miller and 19 other local students plan to head south for Reading Week next month, but instead of languishing on a beach, they'll be building houses in El Salvador.

The project is the first of its kind under the auspices of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, in partnership with the Jewish humanitarian organization, Ve'ahavta. It is actually organized by American Jewish World Service (AJWS), a New York-based, non-profit organization, which is returning to the central American country for the third year as an Alternative Spring Break program.

Last summer, Michelle Lackie, director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, led an AJWS trip to Honduras and Israel, which inspired her to organize this trip out of Toronto. University of Toronto students will join counterparts from Brandeis University from Feb. 18 to 25. Students from York University will be in El Salvador the preceding week, because the two universities have different reading weeks.

Students will stay in newly built dormitories and work alongside Salvadorans. Some of the homes they will be working on may be replacements for houses destroyed by earthquakes or Hurricane Mitch, said an AJWS representative. Local families will provide vegetarian meals.

Lackie will be with the students in the town of Ciudad Romero, in southeastern El Salvador, over both weeks. Jaime Walman, program director at the JSF, the centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University, will accompany the York contingent.

The cost per student totals $900. Fundraising efforts include a Feb. 7 event at Goldie Foxx, a downtown Toronto bar where a number of bands will play.

"It's a very intense trip, with learning and discussion every day," said Lackie. Students can expect to address issues such as Judaism's directives on helping others and what it means to be a Jewish Canadian.

Miller, a religious studies student, said she hopes to return from El Salvador with more knowledge about the country, its people and its culture, as well as a better understanding of herself in relation to Judaism and the modern world.

Her motivation is humanitarian rather than religious, but she hopes to learn about the Jewish aspect, she said. "It's a unique opportunity. I'm really looking forward to it."

Cookies and bars made easy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The following recipes are a mixture of drop cookies and bar cookies, and perfect for the times when you just don't have time to mix and measure but want to serve home-made goodies.

BASIC CAKE MIX COOKIES

1 pkg. cake mix (any flavour)
⅓ cup vegetable oil
2 eggs
1 cup of any additional ingredients such as nuts, raisins, chocolate chips, butterscotch chips

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl combine the cake mix, oil and eggs. Mix well. Add extra ingredients (1 cup total). Drop by teaspoonfuls 2 inches apart onto cookie sheets that have been coated with nonstick baking spray. Bake for 9 to 11 minutes, or until the cookies are firm. Remove the cookies to a wire rack to cool for about 10 minutes. Makes 3 to 3½ dozen cookies.

CAKE MIX LEMON COOKIES

1 pkg. lemon cake mix
½ cup vegetable oil
2 eggs
1 tbsp. lemon zest
1 tub lemon ready-to-spread frosting

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a cookie sheet. Mix dry cake mix, lemon zest, oil and eggs in a large bowl with spoon until dough forms. Drop dough by teaspoonfuls onto cookie sheet. Bake about 8 minutes or until set. Remove from cookie sheet to wire rack to cool completely before frosting. Makes about 4 dozen.

CAKE MIX ROCKY ROAD BARS

1 pkg. milk chocolate cake mix
½ cup unsalted butter, melted
¼ cup packed brown sugar
⅓ cup water
2 eggs
1 cup chopped nuts
3 cups kosher miniature marshmallows
⅓ cup chocolate ready-to-spread frosting

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour rectangular pan, 13 x 9 inches. Mix half the dry cake mix, butter, brown sugar, water and eggs in a large bowl with a spoon until the batter is smooth. Stir in the remaining cake mix and the nuts. Spread the batter in the pan. Bake 20 minutes; sprinkle with marshmallows. Bake 10-15 minutes or until marshmallows are puffed and golden. Microwave frosting in microwaveable bowl uncovered on high 15 seconds. Drizzle the frosting over the bars. Cool completely. For easier cutting, use plastic knife dipped in hot water. Cut into 6 rows by 4 rows. Makes 24 bars.

CAKE MIX PEANUT BUTTER BRICKLE BARS

1 pkg. yellow cake mix
1 cup crunchy peanut butter
⅓ cup water
2 eggs
2 pkgs. (6 oz. each) almond brickle chips or toffee chips with chocolate
1 pkg. (12 oz.) semisweet chocolate chips (2 cups)

Heat oven to 350. Grease and flour jellyroll pan, 15½ x 10½ x 1 inch. In a bowl mix the dry cake mix, peanut butter, water and eggs with spoon. Mix until combined and then stir in brickle or toffee chips. Spread evenly in pan. Bake 20-25 minutes or until golden brown. Immediately sprinkle chocolate chips over hot bars. Let stand 5 minutes or until chips are melted; spread evenly. Cool completely. Cut into 10 rows by 6 rows. Makes 60 bars.

DUMP IN BARS

½ cup margarine, melted
1 pkg. yellow cake mix
3 eggs
1 8-oz pkg. cream cheese, soft
1 lb. powdered sugar
½ cup flaked coconut
½ cup chopped walnuts or pecans

In a bowl combine the margarine, cake mix and one egg. Stir together until dry ingredients are moistened. Pat mixture into bottom of well-greased 15 x 10-inch jellyroll pan. Bake for 10 minutes at 325. Remove from oven and let cool. In another bowl beat the remaining two eggs lightly and then beat in the cream cheese and powdered sugar. Stir in the coconut and nuts. Pour the cream cheese mixture over the crust in the jellyroll pan. Bake at 325 for 35 to 40 minutes or until golden brown. Cool to room temperature before cutting into squares. Makes 24.

CAKE MIX BROWNIES DELUXE

1 pkg. brownie mix
1 cup sour cream
1 16-oz. container coconut pecan frosting
1 cup semisweet chocolate chips
1 cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 350. Grease one 9 x 9-inch baking pan. In a bowl mix the brownie mix according to box directions, omitting half of the oil asked for. Add the sour cream and coconut pecan frosting mix to the batter and after mixing well, spread the batter in the prepared pan. Bake at 350 for 20 to 30 minutes. Be careful not to overbake or it will harden and be impossible to eat! About 5 minutes before it is done take it from the oven and sprinkle semi sweet chocolate chips all over the top along with chopped pecans. Place back in the oven for 5 minutes, take out and use a spatula to spread the chocolate chips around to frost the brownies. Makes 36 brownies.

CAKE MIX CHOCO CARMEL COOKIE BARS

1 pkg. yellow cake mix
½ cup chopped nuts
⅔ cup evaporated milk
¼ cup butter, melted
36 chocolate-covered caramels

Preheat oven to 350. Grease one 9 x 13-inch baking pan. In a bowl combine the cake mix and nuts. Stir in the evaporated milk and melted butter. Mix well. Spread half the cake mix mixture into the prepared pan. Bake at 350 for 15 minutes. Remove from oven and immediately place chocolate-covered caramels over the hot crust. Drop remaining cake mix mixture by teaspoonfuls over the candy pieces. Return to oven and bake for 25 to 30 minutes or until lightly browned. Cool slightly and cut into squares to serve. Makes 2 to 3 dozen.

CAKE MIX CHOCOLATE TOFFEE COOKIES

These are so easy to make, it is almost sinful. So rich and full of chocolate.

1 pkg. devil's food cake mix
⅓ cup vegetable oil
2 eggs
¼ cup coarsely chopped chocolate-covered toffee candy bars

Preheat oven to 350. In a large bowl, combine the cake mix, oil and eggs. Beat with an electric beater for 3 to 4 minutes until well blended. With a spoon, stir in the chopped candy. Drop by teaspoonfuls 2 inches apart onto cookie sheets that have been coated with nonstick baking spray. Bake for 9 to 11 minutes, or until the cookies are firm. Remove the cookies to a wire rack to cool completely. Makes 2 dozen.

OMISSION

In the article titled "Vegetarians can enjoy pareve recipes too" (CJN, Jan. 19) three ingredients were left out of the Wild Rice Soup recipe. The list of ingredients should have included 1 cup pearl barley, 1 cup wild rice and 2 chopped onions. The CJN regrets the omissions.

Carrying moments, images from Israel

By LEN RUDNER
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

It was Willa Cather, I think, who said that there are only a few distinct human experiences, but that they repeat themselves with such ferocity that it is as if they never happened before. That must be why people who visit Israel for the first time feel such a compulsion to share their experience. Perhaps that is why I feel such a need to write these words.

How is it that a man in his late 40s had never been to Israel? When I was a teenager, I had time, but no money. When I was in my twenties, I had money, but no time. And as a father of a teenager and proud owner of a mortgage and two car loans, I had neither time nor money! But for the opportunity to accompany the Canadian delegation to the World Jewish Congress for a seven-day trip in November, this situation would not have changed.

What are my memories of this all-too-brief visit? For that short period of time, my heart became a camera that stored images and moments. I carry them still.

I remember the magic of Jerusalem, and the way that the stone buildings seemed to glow no matter what time of day they were struck by the sun. I remember the magical way that the city seemed to expand and contract as I traveled by taxi from one location to another. How else to explain that a metered trip cost 15 shekels while an un-metered trip cost 25? It could only be the magic of the city.

I remember stealing away to visit Yad Vashem. The site was virtually empty, so for a few hours I followed the Avenue of the Righteous, took the ramp into the darkness that was the children's memorial and stood mute and wet-cheeked, the Kaddish caught like broken glass in my throat as I stood in the Hall of Names. I met a friend from Canada in the museum there. He pointed to one of the pictures on the wall, a picture I had seen many times before. He pointed to one face out of many and said, "look at her face." I looked and realized that I had never seen the faces, her face before. I felt ashamed.

I remember walking up the hill to the Western Wall. I remember feeling frightened. This was the anticipated moment. This was the moment that I was expected to feel. But what if I didn't? What if I approached the Wall and felt nothing? What if the moment was not right or the ruach was simply not there?

I need not have worried. I have no clear memory of crossing the plaza. I only remember touching the Wall, gripping it, feeling the warm, smooth stones as they filled the palms of my hands, the pressure of the rock against my forehead as I leaned heavily against those ancient stones. And all I could think was, "I made it. I'm here."

And as I wonderingly repeated those words, again and again, I thought of those generations in my family who only dreamt of such a moment, and those many more generations who could not even have dreamt of this moment. I thought of those who lived and died in expectation that someone, perhaps even someone like me, would one day have the opportunity to stand in this special place. Never have I felt so small, so insignificant and so fortunate.

I remember standing on the side of a road in Gilo, and looking off into the not-so-great distance to see the Beit Jala across the valley. I remember standing on a rooftop in the centre of Jerusalem, my arms extended to embrace the construction cranes of Efrat on one side and the Old City on the other. I remember thinking to myself, "How small. How close. How precarious." Later, in Toronto, I was asked by an Israeli how I enjoyed my trip. I said, "We have a beautiful country. I think we should keep it."

Len Rudner

I remember taking two late night walks. In Jerusalem I passed Sbarro's and marveled that it had been rebuilt and was bustling with life. In Tel Aviv, I passed the Dolphinarium, and stared at the silent shell and the small monument that bore the names of youth too soon extinguished.

The teenagers of Tel Aviv have constructed their own memorial to their friends. In front of the Dolphinarium there stands a sheet metal silhouette of a boy and girl holding hands. The inscription beneath reads, "They won't make us stop dancing." It is my last picture, and a fitting way to close my album. It is also a message that bears repeating: none of us should stop dancing, not so long as the music of our history pulses within us.

Shipping News, Beautiful Mind וכל השאר

Conservatory will promote Jewish performing arts

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Conservatory for Judaic Performing Arts, an educational program for the study and promotion of Jewish music, dance and narrative forms, will open in 2003, says its chair and founder Dr. Hy Goldman.

Goldman, a physician who also founded the popular Jewish music festival KlezKanada, sees the school as an outgrowth of the festival, which each year has awarded an increasing number of scholarships to promising young musicians who wish to learn klezmer and other types of Jewish music from professional musicians.

An inaugural gala concert in benefit of the conservatory, which was incorporated federally and provincially as a non-profit organization a year ago, will be held Jan. 27 at 7:30 p.m. at the historic 800-seat Outremont Theatre.

The program will showcase the range of Jewish musical expression. Performances will be given by the chamber orchestra I Musici de Montréal, under the direction of Yuli Turovsky and Les Frères Edery, an Andalusian ensemble.

Expects enrolment to be around 75 in the first year

Brave Old World, one of the world's leading klezmer bands, will be performing the world premiere of the Suite for Klezmer Band and Chamber Orchestra, arranged by Brave Old World musical director Alan Bern.

The piece will be a collaboration between Brave Old World, a group famous for its soulful lyricism, and I Musici de Montréal, which has earned international acclaim for its repertoire that ranges from Baroque to Russian classics.

In the opening number, I Musici will play a suite composed by Hankus Netsky of Boston's Klezmer Conservatory Band entitled Chagall's Mandolins, featuring soloist Eric Stein, a former KlezKanada scholarship recipient.

Les Frères Edery is dedicated to the interpretation of the music that originated in Moorish Spain and continued to flourish in Morocco after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. North African Jews played an important role in the preservation and transmission of this music.

The ensemble includes violinist Charles Edery; Prosper Edery on oud, who is also principal voice; and Samy Sebag on darbuka and tar.

Goldman said the conservatory will draw its faculty and students from around the world, and will be open to people of all backgrounds and ages. In its first year, it will be limited to an intensive, four-week summer school.

The conservatory is aimed at those who have already reached a fairly high level of proficiency in their art form, Goldman said. Classes will be given at the intermediate and advanced levels. Narrative forms will include voice, theatre and storytelling.

He expects enrolment to be around 75 in the first year. He hopes to obtain a ratio of five students to one teacher, he said.

The conservatory also hopes to increase public appreciation for the Judaic performing arts, through such events as concerts and lectures.

But what is meant by the term "Judaic"?

While Goldman acknowledges that definitions of what is Jewish in the arts vary, he says one reason "Judaic" rather than "Jewish" was chosen for the conservatory's name is that it was felt "Judaic" is "more all-encompassing." (Its French name is L'École supérieure des arts judaïques de la scène.)

The general opinion among the conservatory's organizers, Goldman said, is that Jewish performing arts should be as inclusive as possible and extend beyond the folkloric.

"Jewish dance, for instance, is more than the horah," said Goldman.

The organizers also agreed that the conservatory should not only preserve traditional works, but encourage the creation of new ones.

But the location of the conservatory has yet to be determined, as well as its source of funding.

"We have not decided whether to be associated with the Jewish community or not," Goldman said. "We are looking for government support at all levels and contacting foundations in Canada and the United States."

The Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal is a sponsor of the concert, and the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC) is serving as the conservatory's interim address.

A number of artists sit on the conservatory's board of directors, including synagogue musical director Stephen Glass, storyteller Oro Anahory-Librowicz, violinist Yaela Hertz Berkson, choreographer Edouard Lock and Turovsky. Its executive director is visual artist Devora Neumark.

"The conservatory will be unique in the world," Goldman said. "We really have no prototype to work with. We will start in a modest way, and go from there."

For concert tickets, call the BJEC at 345-2610.

Gray responds to Globe story

Gray also rejected any inference that Canadian Jews, even politicians, should shrink from expressing support for Israel.

"People who are in public life in Canada, in our pluralistic and multicultural society, are very active and committed supporters of Canada," he said. "At the same time, they're entitled, whatever their origins, to be in touch with their heritage, whether it's ethnic or religious."

The Sixth International Conference of Jewish Ministers and Members of Parliament was sponsored by the Israeli Forum, a private, non-profit group that works to increase contacts between Israel and the Diaspora, not the Israeli government, as the Globe had reported.

Gray said the Israeli Forum "is something like the Conference Board of Canada," a non-profit think-tank in Ottawa.

In a telephone interview from Tel Aviv, conference co-chair Irit Dortal said the Israeli government underwrote only 10 percent of the meeting's costs. She added that the Knesset also paid for a lunch and a dinner it hosted for participants.

The rest of the expenses were picked up by corporate donors, as they have been for the five previous conferences, Dortal said.

The five-day gathering drew 60 legislators from 23 countries and had the support of Israel's foreign ministry and the Knesset.

"My attendance at this meeting is totally consistent with Canadian foreign policy," Gray said. "There's no doubt that Canada is a supporter of Israel and has been since 1948. Our prime minister, our foreign minister have said over and over again that we support an independent and free Israel behind secure and recognized borders."

'My attendance is totally consistent with Canadian foreign policy'

Gray noted that apart from attending the conference, he held one-on-one meetings with Israeli President Moshe Katsav, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. As well, following Israel, he visited Jordan for a meeting with King Abdullah and the country's foreign minister.

Asked who paid his tab, Gray said: "Since I'm here on official business as part of the federal cabinet, I expect my expenses would be paid by the Canadian government, as is customary when a minister carries out official business abroad."

The Globe story, headlined "Israeli-backed event draws top Liberals," said "the Israelis" offered all participants five nights of free hotel accommodation, but added, "it was not clear in all cases whether the Canadian MPs accepted that offer, or whether they are billing the Canadian government for other travel costs."

The invitation to the conference, a copy of which was obtained by The CJN, states that the gathering was sponsored and organized by the Israeli Forum "in cooperation with" the ministry of foreign affairs, the Knesset and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The invitation states that organizers would cover expenses, including accommodation, transport, touring and social programs.

Dortal said most participants "paid from their own pockets." The only delegates to have their expenses covered by the Israeli government, she said, were those from Argentina, which is undergoing a wrenching economic crisis.

The Globe story quoted an aide to Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan as saying that the Canadian government paid all her expenses, including hotel bills.

The article also noted that the airfare of Montreal MP Irwin Cotler was paid by the organizers of an academic meeting to which he spoke on the same trip.

An aide to rookie Winnipeg MP Anita Neville told The CJN that Neville attended only three days of the conference, and then left to accompany Caplan on her official trip to Egypt.

The other Canadians attending the conference were Quebec MP Raymonde Folco and senators Sheila Finestone and Jerry Grafstein.

Jacques Saada, the only Jewish Liberal MP who did not attend the conference, called the Globe article "ludicrous."

"Taking sides...what does that mean? Are we [MPs] free to agree or disagree?" Saada, a Quebec MP, said many countries host meetings for parliamentarians from the around the world, some all-expenses paid, "but that doesn't mean we endorse or don't endorse their policies."

In an editorial the next day (Jan. 9) on Israel's seizure of an arms-laden ship allegedly bound for the Palestinians and the importance of world public opinion in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Globe stated that "Jewish politicians from the around the world are currently being feted by the Israeli government."

Contacted by The CJN, the Globe's foreign editor, John Stackhouse, said there would be a "small" clarification printed. The issues raised in the article were "a little more complicated than I had imagined," Stackhouse conceded.

The clarification appeared this past Monday. It said the Jan. 8 article "should have read that a conference of Jewish politicians, including five Canadian MPs, held in Jerusalem this week (sic) was organized only in part by the Canadian government."

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said he can understand the newspaper reporting on the conference, "but this is not front-page news. The whole thing leaves a bad taste. It's unbecoming of the Globe."

Gray noted that he attended the same conference in 1996. He said he regards this visit as a "useful followup" to the two trips to Israel made last year by Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley.

While in Israel, Gray also held talks with Sari Nusseibeh, the head of Al-Quds University, and who was appointed last year by Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat as the PA's top politician in Jerusalem.

Israel staged weapons ship affair: Iran

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian Defence Minister Ali Shamkhani denied Sunday that Iran has any security ties with Palestinians and said that Israel had staged the "Karine A" weapons ship affair to damage his country's image.

"The racist regime in Israel staged the affair to hurt Iran's image," the minister was quoted as saying by the Islamic Republic News Agency (IRNA). The minister also denied having any security ties with the Palestinian Authority (PA).

"No Iranian organization was involved in the transport of weapons to Palestinian territories," Shamkhani reiterated, and added that such claims were meant to influence the decisions of U.S. officials.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran has had no military relations with [PA Chairman Yasser] Arafat and no steps have been taken by any Iranian organization for the shipment of arms to the mentioned lands," Shamkhani was quoted as saying.

"In its actions, Israel is endangering American interests, peace and stability in the region," he added.

Israel Defence Forces (IDF) Brigadier General Yossi Kuperwasser, who headed a contingent of Israeli security officials that briefed U.S. counterparts two weeks ago in Washington on Arafat's personal involvement in the affair, reports that the Americans no longer doubt that Arafat himself personally initiated contacts with Iran or that these contacts led to the acquisition of weapons and their being loaded aboard the ship.

A slightly abridged version of the information has been furnished to Egyptian officials (some details were excised, due to concerns about exposing sources). The intelligence information provided by Israeli security sources has also persuaded the Egyptians of the veracity of Israel's claims.

CIA head George Tenet and other senior figures in the U.S. intelligence-security establishment have decided that information supplied by Israel is credible and accurate.

Israel Radio reported Sunday that Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer has ordered the IDF to make the PA-Iran relationship a direct focus of its intelligence efforts, and that he also plans to raise Israel's fears about an emerging Iran-Hezbollah-PA triangle.

Israeli security sources say that the members of the contingent in Washington presented irrefutable evidence to the U.S. officials, proving that Arafat reached a decision in summer 2001 to change strategic directions, and work to establish a Palestinian-Iranian alliance.

This initiative started with contacts beween trusted emissaries representing Arafat and Iranian spiritual leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. At the end of these contacts, Khamenei decided to overlook his objections to Arafat's willingness to forge compromises with Israel in the Oslo peace process, and increase his country's influence in the PA.

The Iranian ruler decided to exploit an opportunity to change the focus of his country's anti-Israeli activity, moving away from the Lebanon context, and working instead in the Palestinian arena. The Arafat-Khamenei decision, Israeli security sources say, was reached before Sept. 11, and it was implemented despite U.S. peace envoy Anthony Zinni's visits to the region, Arafat's cease-fire speech on Dec. 16, and the "hudna" proposal for a cease-fire arrangement submitted to Israel's President Moshe Katsav.

Officials in Israel's security establishment believe that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has grasped that Arafat operated behind Cairo's back, exploiting the use of the Suez Canal, the harbour zone in Alexandria and Egyptian fishing boats; and that he also invited the Iranians (bitter rivals of Egypt on key policy issues) to step up their influence in traditional areas of Egyptian influence.

Israel rejected Saturday the PA's announcement that it had arrested those responsible for the weapons shipment on Karine A, the ship seized by Israeli commandos on Jan. 3 in the Red Sea.

In an announcement by the Prime Minister's Office and quoting a "senior security source," Jerusalem said that the man responsible for the funding in the affair, Fuad Shobaki, was in Ramallah "and is in no way under arrest," while the two other members of the Palestinian naval force, Adel Mughrabi and Fathi Razem, are not in PA territory.

Nabil Amr, a senior aide to Arafat, later altered the PA version and said that only one security official was detained.

"The president [Arafat] has ratified the warrants," Amr said. "We have detained and are questioning Fuad Shobaki while the other two, Fathi Razem and Adel Mughrabi, are not in town. The investigating committee will do all that is necessary to continue this probe."

TRAVEL Israel

Eilat-Beyond the Sea

There's more to Eilat than meets the beach. Not far beyond the year-round Red Sea resort sunshine and coral reefs lie magnificent natural formations filled with history and some mystery as well.

Travel just about 30 kilometres north of Eilat to Timna Park and you'll find evidence of nature's sculptural genius through rare rock configurations carved over time within a desert landscape. Among them are the famous bright pink sandstone columns known as Solomon's Pillars.

And the Torah, too, comes to life at Timna Park, with a replica of the mishkan – the portable Tabernacle and its holy vessels - carried by the Jewish people during their biblical wanderings. The mishkan preceded both the Temple and our modern-day synagogue.

All of these natural and reconstructed wonders, such as 6,000 year old Egyptian copper mines, are accompanied by the amenities that a contemporary tourist expects – a shopping spot for unique souvenirs, a restaurant and activities for kids.

The entrance fee for Timna Park is only about $8 Canadian per person with English-speaking tours available. The park is an easy drive from Eilat or a top stop on one of the many Eilat-based tours heading for this magnificent site.

Next week, a peek inside Israel's grand canyon.

CIA concerned about Syrian nuclear plans

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The CIA last week presented an annual report to the U.S. Senate in which the American intelligence agency said it "remains concerned about Syria's intentions regarding nuclear weapons."

The report, published as a declassified summary, says, "Syria maintains a ballistic missile and rocket force of hundreds of FROG rockets, Scuds, and SS-21 SRBMs. With considerable foreign assistance, Syria progressed to Scud production using primarily locally manufactured parts. Syrian regional concerns may lead Damascus to seek a longer range ballistic missile capability such as North Korea's No Dong medium range ballistic missile."

The U.S. intelligence community says the report "believes Iraq has retained a small, covert force of Scud-type missiles, launchers, and Scud-specific production equipment and support apparatus. For the next several years at least, Iraq's ballistic missile initiatives probably will focus on reconstituting its pre-Gulf War capabilities to threaten regional targets."

"With substantial foreign assistance, Baghdad could flight-test a domestic mid-range missile by the middle of the decade," says the report, explaining that without international monitoring, and with help from Russia, China and North Korea, Iraq could renew its capabilities as they existed in 1991, before Operation Desert Storm. New, liquid fuel al-Samud missiles, with ranges up to 150 kilometers, will soon be deployed in Iraq, and Baghdad could extend their range, says the report.

According to the CIA, the Iranian-developed Shihab-3, based on the North Korean No Dong missile, is in advanced stages of development, and Iran could launch it during a conflict. Its range, 1,300 kilometers, puts it within reach of Israel. The American intelligence community says that Iran still doesn't have a nuclear capability, but could have one by the end of the decade – or sooner, if it gets foreign help.

The American intelligence estimate is less foreboding than the one voiced by Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer in a recent speech to the Council for Peace and Security, an organization of former senior officers in Israel's defense establishment.

Ben-Eliezer said he sees "a gradual move from the threat of conventional warfare to non-conventional warfare, which is turning realistic, worrisome and significant. So far, we've dealt with the nuclear weapons only as a theoretical threat, far from us, but around 2005, Iran will have nuclear capabilities that will threaten us, the region and possibly the entire world's security. Iran unceasingly supports terror organizations and we assume that getting nuclear weapons will increase its support for terror and for regional violence."

According to Ben-Eliezer, the "new alliance" between Iran, Hezbollah and the Palestinian Authority (PA) is the worrying issue exposed by the Karine A weapons ship episode. The defence minister believes that this new development is even more important than the personal involvement of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat in the weapons smuggling scheme. He said if the PA had used the weapons found on the ship, it would have changed the fighting from a limited conflict to something much wider.

"Behind the smuggling attempt was co-operation between the PA, Iran and Hezbollah," said Ben-Eliezer, "and the latter two are strategic threats to Israel. The ship incident proves the potential of regional threats from their most significant source."

Since the ship's capture two weeks ago, the intelligence community has accumulated evidence of the involvement of Hezbollah activist Imad Mugniyah, who is on the U.S. most wanted terrorist list, in the Karine A affair. Mugniyah is connected to the Iranian organization involved in foreign terror attacks and is wanted by the United States for his involvement in airplane hijackings.

More Jewish Canadians visit Israel

TORONTO — The proportion of Jews from Canada visiting Israel virtually doubled last year over the year before, according to the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO).

Approximately 41 per cent of nearly 33,000 Canadian tourists to Israel in 2001 were Jewish, compared to 22 percent in 2000. And the proportion of Jewish visitors from Canada last year was higher than it was for other parts of the world, IGTO says.

Dani Shahal, Israel's tourism consul to Canada and director of IGTO, cites troubled times for the upsurge in Jewish travel.

"Canadian Jews are extremely loyal to Israel and when Israel is suffering from a crisis as it is now, Canadian Jewish community members respond strongly by visiting the country," he said.

Shahal notes comparably large Canadian Jewish tourism figures in 1998 when Israel also faced troubled times.

He's urging Jews across Canada to take advantage of solidarity tours offered by synagogues and organizations such as Jewish federations. A list of missions is available from IGTO (igto@idirect.com or 416-964-3784).

A detailed, statistical survey conducted for Israel's ministry of tourism during the first half of 2001 provides many other insights into the characteristics of Jewish visitors to Israel:

- Thirty-five percent of Canadian Jews who visited Israel were Orthodox, 33 percent were Conservative and nine percent were Reform.
- Nearly half of Jewish tourists from around the world chose Israel as their destination of choice for educational or religious reasons.
- The Western Wall, the Jewish Quarter in the Old City of Jerusalem, and Jerusalem's Tower of David are the sites most visited by Jewish tourists.
- Eighty-seven percent of Jewish tourists were repeat visitors.

Although the proportion of Canadian Jews visiting Israel has increased substantially, Israel, which welcomed 1.2 million visitors last year, is suffering from a dramatic decline in overall tourism, IGTO states. The Israel Hotel Association estimates that Israel's economy lost $1.8 billion because of the tourism slump.

Move to allow shchitah spurs Swiss debate

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERN — The Swiss government has launched a campaign to end a century-old law barring Jewish ritual slaughter.

Launched by Economics Minister Pasqual Couchepin, the campaign has created a heated outcry against any lessening of the prohibition.

It also prompted fears of a widespread anti-Semitic backlash in a country that has experienced such backlashes in recent years, after Switzerland came under international pressure to settle a variety of Holocaust-related claims.

In a recent newspaper interview, Couchepin admitted to some surprise at the stir his proposal has caused. But he said the move to allow ritual slaughter must be seen as a human rights issue.

Noting that an European Union tribunal ruled that the right to perform shchitah must be respected, he added, "We must decide whether we want to stand on the side of human rights."

Shchitah, or Jewish ritual slaughter, is widely believed to be a humane form of slaughter. But proponents of the Swiss law believe otherwise.

Most European countries – with the exception of Switzerland and Sweden – permit shchitah.

Animal rights groups, who have lobbied actively on the subject, have threatened to seek a national referendum if the government seeks to allow shchitah. The electorate has the right under Swiss law to hold a referendum on almost any legislative initiative.

Observers believe the move to allow shchitah would be defeated in a referendum. A recent government-sponsored survey showed all the Swiss cantons, or states, are against allowing shchitah.

Some historians maintain that the original law, which went into effect in 1893, was drafted because of anti-Semitism, not to protect animals.

Since the government launched the initiative, Swiss newspapers have been flooded with letters from animal rights supporters backing the existing prohibition.

Many of the letters have anti-Semitic overtones, with some referring to shchitah as a "holocaust of the animals."

Most editorials in Swiss papers speak out against changing the law.

A campaign against overturning the law recently was launched by Erwin Kessler, who had been sentenced by the Swiss Federal Court in Lausanne to several months imprisonment for anti-Semitic offences.

Alfred Donath, the president of the Federation of Jewish Communities, has called for an end to "the discriminating law."

But some Swiss Jews are concerned the government campaign may only increase anti-Semitism.

"We have to ask ourselves if a new wave of anti-Semitism is in our interests," Peter Abelin wrote in the Jewish magazine Tachles.

Israel to end home demolitions

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee on Monday that he, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer had decided in a Sunday meeting to end the demolition of Palestinian homes in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The foreign minister told the committee that the damage caused to Israel's image by this kind of action was a large factor in the decision.

However, Peres emphasized that he himself was not opposed to the demolitions solely because of the international criticism, but rather for "traditional-Jewish reasons.

"We came to the conclusion," he said, "that... the damage caused was greater than the value [of the demolitions]."

Sharon had come under international criticism for his decision earlier in the week to demolish Palestinian homes in the southern Gaza Strip.

A European Union official said the Israeli demolitions were "unjustified." The International Red Cross said 53 homes were razed and hundreds of Palestinians made homeless as a result of the Jan. 10 demolitions.

Israel razed the homes after a Hamas attack last week on an army outpost near Gaza; four Israeli soldiers were killed.

The Israel army said that only 21 buildings were razed and that all were abandoned. Army officials also said the structures had been used by armed Palestinian gunmen to launch attacks on Israeli targets. Some of the buildings were used to hide tunnels in which arms were smuggled from Egypt to Gaza, the officials added.

Some Israeli cabinet members also criticized the demolitions.

Labour party ministers, including Peres and Ephraim Sneh, questioned the policy, calling it unnecessary and harmful to Israel's public image.

Sharon reprimanded the ministers for speaking before being briefed by the army on details of the operation.

He said at Sunday's cabinet meeting that critics were merely serving the interests of Palestinian propaganda.

Education Minister Limor Livnat, a member of Sharon's Likud party, rejected claims that the demolitions were an act of collective punishment. She said they were a defensive act designed to prevent attacks by Palestinians.

On Sunday, some 100 Peace Now activists demonstrated in Tel Aviv against the demolitions.

The CJN is pleased to announce
The Sixth Annual
Passover Literary Supplement.

We invite the authors and poets among our readers to submit their works. The works must be previously unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction cannot be longer than 1,500 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than Feb. 15, 2002
Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our seventh annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 21. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 2002. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 8, 2002.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 21, 2002.

Anti-Semitism in France takes on a new form — 'pro-intifadaism'

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

In announcing the establishment of an international committee to combat anti-Semitism, Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior declared "France is the worst western country as far as the number of anti-Semitic incidents is concerned."

The declaration and the announcement struck representatives of the French Jewish community like a thunderbolt.

The French Jewish community is the second largest only to the United States among Diaspora communities. Certain elements in that community have been warning for some time about a significant increase in the number of violent incidents against Jewish institutions, but they, too, were amazed that the Israeli Foreign Ministry did not bother to consult with them before announcing the establishment of the committee.

Melchior reported there were 312 incidents in France last year, "but they don't take anti-Semitism seriously in France," he said, adding, "we sense a certain hesitation by the French authorities about what is necessary to do to halt the wave of anti-Semitism."

In response, the French Interior Ministry, responsible for the police and security services, says that anti-Semitism is on the decline. According to official statistics, by the end of November 2001, there were only 26 incidents, compared to 119 during the entire previous year. The number of anti-Semitic threats also dropped from 624 in 2000 to 155 in 2001.

The sweeping Israeli accusation drew, as could have been expected, equally vehement reactions. "I can promise you that the French authorities are absolutely committed to fighting all forms of anti-Semitism," said the Foreign Ministry's spokesperson, while the president's spokesperson said that President Jacque Chirac condemned every form of anti-Semitic activity.

There is no reason to doubt the French commitment to fighting anti-Semitism, and certainly not the commitment of either Chirac or French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin. Both have been consistent in their attitude toward anti-Semitic incidents and France's past Vichy government.

Israeli representatives in France make clear in no uncertain terms that describing France as an "anti-Semitic state" is ridiculous, insulting and causes insufferable harm.

The gap between the Israeli data on anti-Semitic incidents and the data provided by Paris, may be the result of the relatively new character of attacks on Jews and Jewish institutions in France. In the past, most anti-Jewish activity was conducted by far-right extremists – skinheads and neo-Nazis. Today, most of the incidents are apparently perpetrated by French teens of Arab descent, children of immigrants and residents of slums in city suburbs.

The attacks, such as the arson of a Jewish school, and the break-in of a synagogue in the Paris suburb of Creteil, take place in neighbourhoods where there is a large Muslim population.

A senior Israeli diplomat in Paris said the incidents "are apparently an expression of hostility by a very specific community, and it worsened after September 11.

"At the same time, there's an anti-Israeli political discourse on the extreme left that slips into the mainstream left. It worsened against the background of the intifadah, and is sometimes infected by anti-Semitic characterizations. But one must not be carried away and refer to every anti-Israeli criticism, no matter how vehement, as a form of anti-Semitism."

Experts and researchers in France have found it difficult to quantify the "anti-Semitic" dimension of the legitimate criticism of the Israeli occupation or human rights violations by Israeli authorities. They are also not convinced that France is unusual in Europe.

The feelings described by Melchior and mentioned by mostly right-wing Jewish leaders in France is the result of what they perceive as the efforts by French authorities to whitewash incidents that should have lit a red light.

A typical example was a fight held between Jewish and Arab youths on the Champs Elysée last September. The incident was sparked either by the Jewish teens or the Arabs – in either case, police needed to call in reinforcements and close the famous boulevard for a few hours before quiet was restored. Yet nothing about the event appeared in the French press. Nobody in the Jewish community believes the authorities kept it quiet to protect the rioters. Everyone understands that the conspiracy of silence was meant to prevent incitement in both communities.

But among some Jews, there is a profound feeling that the French authorities would prefer to whitewash rather than deal directly with the problem.

Israeli representatives admit that there has been a rise in the number of attacks on Jewish targets such as synagogues and kosher butcher shops. "Yes, the problem is widespread in France, but it's important to remember that France has the largest community of Jews in Europe and the largest community of Muslims," said the senior Israeli diplomat in Paris.

Jewish and official sources said while the incidents are in reaction to what is happening in the territories, they are largely the result of a domestic phenomenon in France.

"This isn't traditional anti-Semitism that we know," said a leading French Jew.

"These violent youths are French, the children of immigrants, who are dealing with racism and poverty. They hate France, and they are an ideal reservoir for draftees into causes like Osama bin Laden's."

Argentine Jews turn their attention to Zion

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Some 1,300 Argentine Jews have approached representatives of the Jewish Agency over the past 10 days to look into the possibility of immigrating to Israel, Jewish Agency Chairman Salai Meridor said yesterday.

Meridor, who returned last week from a trip to Argentina, said the Jewish Agency received 10 times the number of requests compared to normal periods. Last year, 1,418 Argentine Jews immigrated to Israel, with an additional 97 arriving in the first nine days of 2002.

Meridor said that during his brief visit, he met with hundreds of Jews who expressed a desire to move to Israel. Rabbis and local Jewish leaders have also looked into immigrating to Israel with their congregations and communities, he said.

"What I found there was a Jewish community in a deep crisis, with growing fears stemming both from a deteriorating economic situation and from the new regime," Meridor said, adding that some 20,000 Argentine Jews had fallen into poverty and were no longer able to continue sending their children to Jewish educational institutions.

Meridor said most Jewish organizations in Argentina are focusing their efforts on helping local Jews look into immigrating to Israel. However, some Jews are probing other venues including the United States, Spain and Italy.

The Jewish Agency is sending dozens of former Argentines who have settled in Israel to their home country on "reserve duty" to assist in organizing the expected wave of immigration.

"In particular, we are beefing up our personnel in the outlying towns, where some 40,000 Jews are living, with the assumption that the rate of immigration from there will be higher," Meridor said.

The Jewish Agency also plans to add $1 million to its budget for Jewish education in Argentina, and Meridor expressed hope that Israel would soon make good on its commitment to increase its share of financing Jewish education there.

"If we don't do this immediately, a significant number of Jewish children whose families are no longer capable of funding their studies within a Jewish framework will drop out of these frameworks," he said.

Jewish Agency treasurer Haim Chessler said this year the organization would increase its operational budget for Argentina by 75 percent compared to last year.

Film examines obscure Israeli sect

Hebrew Israelites are not halachically Jewish, although they follow Torah

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Hebrew Israelites, an African-American religious sect led by a charismatic preacher named Ben Ami Ben Israel, settled in Israel in 1969, much to the curiosity and puzzlement of Israelis.

Concentrated today in the Negev development town of Dimona, the Hebrew Israelites believe in the Torah and keep the Sabbath, although halachically they are not Jewish.

Some of their men also practise polygamy and are allowed to have up to seven wives.

Sister-Wife, a one-hour documentary to be broadcast by TVOntario on Wednesday, Jan. 23 at 10 p.m. and again on Sunday, Jan. 27 at midnight, examines this sect through the prism of a Hebrew Israelite man who enters into a so-called "divine marriage."

An Israeli film directed by directed by Timna Goldstein and Hadar Kleinman, Sister-Wife focuses on Hazriel, a former drug addict from the slums of Detroit.

For reasons unfortunately left unexplained, Hazriel, a father of nine children, decides to marry Aerela, who is 14 years younger than his first wife, Zipora.

A fairly feisty woman, Zipora does not appear to resent his decision. In fact, she regards the imminent wedding with some anticipation.

In preparation for that blessed day, Hazriel, a welder who can presumably afford a second wife, enlarges his house. Meanwhile, Zipora and Aerela shop for bed sheets at a local market.

At the wedding ceremony, a fairly simple affair, a singer regales the guests with a song about the power of love.

As Zipora beams, Hazriel twirls Aerela around his arms. Then, for good measure, he gives Zipora a big hug. The man is in his element.

Tensions set in after the wedding when Zipora complains that Aerela is not "communicating" with her. Like so much in this amorphous film, Zipora's complaint remains vague.

Some months later, Aerela gives birth to a girl. Hazriel is happy. "Everything is going great," he gushes.

Later, to perhaps everyone's surprise, he suggests that he may be ready for a third wife, three to five years down the road.

The protagonists are not fleshed out at all and basically remain ciphers.

More annoyingly, Goldstein and Kleinman do not bother to draw even a rudimentary portrait of the Hebrew Israelites' origins, beliefs and customs.

We are offered glimpses of their lives – for example, Sisterhood Day, during which Hebrew Israelite woman dressed in white chant hymns and songs – but really nothing more.

Canada Pops Orchestra leaves a resounding note

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Canada Pops Orchestra performing at Massey Hall.

TORONTO — The Massey Hall debut of the Canada Pops Orchestra, a non-profit organization, was a spirited, musical event that demonstrated the talent and versatility of the musicians and musical director David Warrack, renowned composer and conductor.

The mandate of the 60 musician orchestra is to establish a world-class orchestra that would act as a showcase for Canadian performing artists, arrangers, composers and directors. It has attracted a diverse spectrum of musicians and music lovers. The music spans from classical to jazz--blues, Latin, country, holiday and Broadway tunes. Warrack says he is motivated by a desire to bring joy to his audience.

The Canada Pops Orchestra fulfills Warrack's dream to present exciting musical programs that uplift and delight the audience. The Massey Hall debut concert had all the elements from Elgar to Berlin and from Avenu Sholom Aleichem to O Holy Night. Lola Rasminsky, a director of the Canada Pops, said when she first saw the orchestra when it premiered at the Canadian National Exhibition last summer, "I left on an incredible high which lasted for days.

> 'The joy that the audience and orchestra members were feeling got me hooked'

"The joy that the audience and orchestra members were feeling throughout the concert got me hooked."

She adds that the orchestra's music appeals to all kinds of people. "It's accessible, entertaining and fun with the highest standards of musicianship. It's a very exciting and important addition to the musical landscape of Canada."

Jackie Richardson, stage and screen actor and singer, roused the audience with gospel, boogie-woogie, swing and love songs. Her New Orleans style presentation of Birth of the Blues was soul music of the finest.

Concert master, violinist Moshe Hammer's solo presentations exemplifies the virtuoso quality of the musicians. Hungarian born Hammer, who was raised in Israel and has been the music director of the Amadeus Ensemble since 1985, is one of Canada's most sought after violinists.

There was an overwhelming response to the formidable Three Cantorial Tenors, Paul Kowarsky, Benjamin Maissner and Yaakov Motzen, which drew bravos and an encore for their medley, A Dream is Born.

Their performance included Hebrew, Israeli, Yiddish, prayers, psalms including favorites, Maoz Tsur and Yerushalayim Shel Zahav.

Emphasis was placed on Canadian artists, among them Bill Bridges' arrangements and the music of Beverley Glenn-Copeland and John Weinzweig.

The uniqueness of the Canadian Pops' repertoire will be presented in their 2002-2003 season. It will feature several concerts at the home base in Massey Hall, ballroom concerts, summer performances, and two cross-country tours. And new works will be commissioned.

Kafka and Son: At the age of 35, the alienated Czech-Jewish writer Franz Kafka penned 50 pages of confession, recrimination and desperation to his overbearing father. The letter presents a brutally honest and sometimes funny self-analysis by a writer who considered all of his writing a response to his relationship with his father. Themes and incidents evoked in Kafka's letter recur in his more famous works like The Trial, The Metamorphosis and The Hunger Artist.

Actor Alon Nashman, who appeared recently in the Steve Martin play Picasso at the Lapin Agile, has been exploring the theatrical possibilities of Kafka's Letter to His Father. He and director Mark Cassidy and designer Marysia Bucholc of Theaturtle are presenting a public reading of Kafka and Son as part of the Between Stages Reading Series.

Israeli Arts and Letters: After landing at Cairo Airport some 13 years ago, I became apprehensive as a customs officer searched my luggage and focused on one item in particular – a novel by the Egyptian writer Najib Mahfuz. He examined the book thoroughly, scanning the pages and jacket copy as though in a bookstore. After a few minutes he asked my opinion of the book. I replied with honest praise and he returned the book and waved me into Egypt.

Actually, there was nothing surprising in the customs agent's interest: after all, Mahfuz had won the Nobel prize only days earlier. What may be surprising to some, however, is the amount of attention this leading Arab writer continues to receive in Israel, where a new biography of him was recently published.

The book is Najib Mahfuz: The Novelist Philosopher of Cairo, by Menahem Milson, and it was published simultaneously in Jerusalem (Magnes Press) and New York (St. Martin's). I know of the book only because it received a favourable review in the latest edition of Ariel: The Israel Review of Arts and Letters.

Produced by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ariel is the only Israeli magazine to open a window on the country's cultural scene for non-Hebrew readers. Ariel's reviewer lauded the Mahfuz biography and said it entices its readers "to fall in love with both Mahfuz and Cairo." The review is one of a handful of stories in the current issue to deal with the Arab world.

The lead story focuses on Jerusalem's Museum on the Seam, which tries to encourage a spirit of understanding and co-existence between Israelis and Arabs. Another piece focuses on Arabic literature in Israel. The issue also contains an excellent Holocaust story by Amir Gutfreund, poems by Yehuda Amichai, several stories on the natural environment in Israel, and other goodies. In short, Ariel is a grab-bag of progressive liberal Israeli thinking and culture, meant for export around the world. It is published in English, French, German, Russian, Spanish and Arabic.

The first issue of Ariel appeared in 1962, but the magazine almost didn't reach its 40th anniversary, since the ministry temporarily suspended publication a while ago due to lack of funds. The current issue marks its triumphant (and hopefully permanent) return. For subscription details, visit Ariel's Web site at www.mfa.gov.il and choose "Culture."

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.
-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210.

Last remaining synagogue on Rhodes is well worth a visit

By HENRY SREBRNIK
Special to The CJN

RHODES — It's no wonder UNESCO has declared the old fortified town of Rhodes a world heritage site – it's an absolute gem, an exquisite jewel of a city.

Situated on the Greek Aegean island of the same name, Rhodes has had a continuous history of 2,400 years; it has been home to successive Hellenic, Roman, Greek Orthodox, Arab, Roman Catholic and Muslim Turkish civilizations, each of which has left a wealth of art, artifacts and architecture on this beautiful and sunny isle.

Ancient Greek acropolises, Roman temples, Byzantine churches, Roman Catholic palaces, and Turkish mosques – all of them can be found, sometimes literally one on top of the other, on Rhodes.

Archeological excavations and restorations seem to be in progress on every second block. And for those interested in more than culture and history, Rhodes, lest we forget, has some of the most beautiful beaches in the world!

A castle built by the Knights.

After being governed by the Byzantines, Persians, Saracens, Venetians and Genoese, the island fell into the hands of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem in 1309. Founded at the time of the Crusades to care for sick and wounded Christian pilgrims to the Holy Land, this devout Roman Catholic order of monks had become a powerful legion of fierce warriors battling Islam.

From Rhodes they defied the Turks on the mainland of Anatolia for 213 years, until they were finally vanquished by the armies of the Ottoman sultan Suleyman the Magnificent in 1522.

The famed Palace of the Grand Masters of the Order, and the buildings along Odos Ipoton, the Street of the Knights where the soldier-monks once lived, are among the most magnificent medieval structures in all of Europe. The resplendent palace, the inside of which was accidentally destroyed by a gunpowder explosion in 1856, is now a museum, as is the New Hospital, built by the Knights in the 15th century, in Platia Mousiou (Museum Square), which now houses the Archeological Museum of Rhodes. Both contain wonderful examples of Greco-Roman pottery, marble statues, frescoes and other artwork, and have lovely gardens. Neither should be missed.

Jews appear to have lived on Rhodes, the largest and easternmost of the 13 Dodecanese islands, since Roman times; they are mentioned in the writings of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus. The famed medieval Jewish traveller Benjamin of Tudela founded a community of almost 500 Jews here in 1166. But things took a turn for the worse with the arrival of the Knights, who brooked no opposition to their Catholic faith; even the Greek Orthodox peasantry on the island was oppressed.

So it should come as no surprise to learn that the Jews on Rhodes were treated badly: following a plague in 1498-1500, the Order, in 1502, issued an edict requiring all Jewish inhabitants to be baptized into the Catholic faith. Those who refused were given 40 days to leave the island for Nice, France, without their possessions.

During the last two decades of the Order's rule, some 2,000 to 3,000 Jewish slaves were brought to Rhodes by the Knights and were put to work building fortifications, in anticipation of a Turkish invasion.

Given their lot, the Jews of Rhodes welcomed the Turks; in fact, they helped the Turks conquer the island fortress. Under the benevolent rule of the Ottomans, the small Jewish community was augmented by Sephardim who had been evicted from Spain afer 1492. The Kahal Gadol synagogue had already been built under the Knights; as the community grew, a number of others were established, including the Kahal Shalom Synagogue, founded in 1577.

During the four centuries of Turkish rule, the community grew to some 4,500, fully one-third of the city's population. Jews were merchants, craftsmen, small shopkeepers and artisans; many became rabbis and scholars. Secular education arrived with the schools of the Alliance Israelite Universelle in the 20th century.

Rhodes became an Italian colony in 1912 and many of its Jews emigrated during the Mussolini era. When the islands were occupied by the Nazis following Italy's surrender in September 1943, the remaining 1,673 Jews were engulfed in the fires of the Holocaust. Transported to Auschwitz in July 1944, only 161 survived. Even on this warm, sunny Aegean island, mere miles from Turkey, the evil hand of Adolf Hitler had reached out to destroy Jewish life.

Since Rhodes became part of Greece in 1947, fewer than 50 Jews have lived here.

The Kahal Shalom synagogue is located in La Juderia, the old Jewish quarter of Rhodes, at the intersection of two narrow cobblestoned alleyways named Dossiadou and Simiou. In 1939, there were still six synagogues in Rhodes, but today, it is the only one left. It remains the oldest functioning synagogue in all of Greece.

Constructed of indigenous porous stone, Kahal Shalom blends in with the other buildings in the little streets that surround it. The interior follows the traditional Sephardi style, with the prayer reading table in the centre of the sanctuary facing towards Jerusalem. The room has painted arches supported by large columns, and two arks frame a courtyard doorway. The floor is a mosaic of black-and-white pebbled tiles, as is the outer courtyard leading to the adjoining Jewish Museum, which features an exhibit of pre-war Jewish life on the island.

A library that once stood here was destroyed in 1944. In fact, much of La Juderia was obliterated during the war. The Platia Martyron Evreon, the Square of the Martyred Jews, which is one of the main open air plazas in the old town, was originally an area of Jewish homes and small shops. The lovely fountain with its three seahorses at the centre, and the numerous restaurants and cafés that surround it, make the square a popular gathering place for tourists. It is also home to the only remaining Jewish store in the old town, Anna Cohen Jewellery.

The synagogue and museum are open from April through October, and there are Friday night services in the sanctuary whenever a minyan gathers. In summer this should prove no problem. When my wife and I were there, in May, a constant stream of Jewish visitors, from Israel, Mexico, Russia, Sweden, the United States and elsewhere, passed through.

The Jewish cemetery is located outside the walls of the old town along the main coastal road to Kalithea, on the eastern side of the island. There are many attractive yet inexpensive pensions and other small lodgings in the old Jewish quarter. We stayed in one on Ikarou Street, just a block from the synagogue. A lovely little structure with an enclosed courtyard, it afforded us complete privacy.

The Spot Hotel, a charming building on Perikleous Street, is directly behind the synagogue; its owner, who grew up in the old Fletcher's Field neighbourhood of Montreal, told me that many Israeli tours have made use of its facilities.

However, the growth of cruise ship tourism has hurt hostelries here, he said. North American Jews, he complained, now come mainly on the giant ocean liners and have no need to book into local hotels.

Rhodes lies just a few miles off the Turkish mainland, a one-hour trip by fast catamaran, or 45 minutes by hydrofoil, from the lovely Turkish resort of Marmaris. (Since prices are cheaper on the Turkish side, some tourists take only day trips.) The island is also well served by a network of ferries that ply the Greek islands, and there are daily excursions to nearby islands such as Symi and Kos – themselves worthy of extended visits. Charter and regularly scheduled airlines fly into the modern international airport on Rhodes from Athens and other major European cities. Arkia Airlines connects Rhodes with Israel.

For more information, contact the Jewish Community of Rhodes at 5 Polydorou St., Rhodes, Greece, call: 3-02-417-3039; or e-mail: jcrhodes@otenet.gr and info@rhodesjewishmuseum.org.

Joshua Engel embarks on a musical journey

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Few CDs by one artist are as versatile as the debut CD by multi-instrumentalist Joshua Engel.

Ranging from love ballads to instrumentals to harmonies to punk rock, Swimming To Catch The Sun is a personal, musical journey – a musical stream of consciousness.

"It was even weirder before I made some cuts," Engel, 26, says, realizing the limitations of such a wide-ranging collection of songs.

"It's not easy listening, but I'm not doing it for commercial success. The CD is an expression of where I'm at. It was based on a journey I took. [All the songs were written while travelling through South America – some recorded directly through a microphone on the street, complete with the sounds of traffic].

"Those were the songs I was writing then. The CD is a glimpse of that period in my life. To put some songs away in a closet [because they don't fit together] is not what I want to do."

Engel who sings, plays guitars, bass, drums and mandolin on his CD got his start very early on, enrolling at the Royal Conservatory of Music at the age of three.

"I got lots of encouragement from my parents," he says. "I started piano lessons early and then picked up the guitar – I liked the showmanship of walking around with a guitar."

Since then, Engel studied jazz techniques at McGill University in Montreal and started to explore his talent for songwriting. He's participated in KlezKanada three times, performed with many musicians, and was one of the founding members of the klezmer band Beyond The Pale, before leaving in 1999 to pursue other musical forms.

Joshua Engel

"Klezmer has a strong influence on what I do, but I don't write in that type of style," he says.

"I'm a guitar player and it's a weird feeling being in a klezmer band. You're expected to play the mandolin."

Engels still occasionally plays with Beyond The Pale, and had a guest spot on their latest CD Routes.

Listen to Swimming to Catch The Sun, and you'll realize that Engels must like all sorts of music.

"I like music that surpasses classification in any genre," he says. "I don't dislike any music unless it's really horrible – even the Back Street Boys have some good riffs."

The CD is definitely a showcase of his amazing talent, even if it can throw the listener for a loop with its unexpected twists – like the funky punk rocker Punk Rock Seahorse.

"A journey is never straight and narrow," Engel explains, emphasizing the "journey" concept behind his album. "All sorts of unexpected things happen in life."

He explains further in the liner notes of the album. "The juxtaposing of forms and styles seems perfectly natural to me. Each style compliments the others just as opposites compliment each other."

Swimming...begins with a bluesy, rocky number Same Old Songs, an expression of his disillusionment with his musical direction at the time, and picks up his journey from there.

Engel's adaptability proved useful when he got an offer to work with Starshine Productions, a theatre company that produces original entertainment for children, including the recently performed Uncle Jeb's Farm. Engel currently serves as the musical director and also acted in that play.

"We do thought provoking children's musicals. Since 1999 we've done three different productions and the company's become part of my family," he says. They recently performed a series of free shows for school kids in Detroit public libraries.

Engel still hasn't figured out exactly where he would like his talents to take him, but he says he'll be happy as long as music is part of his future.

"I think I'm still searching for what I want to make a career out of. Something will unfold in time," he says confidently.

True to his musical versatility, Engel insists his next CD will be completely different. "It will be a lot more groove oriented – a little bit more fun and upbeat."

Engel performs around Toronto frequently and continues to compose, arrange and record. To pick up a copy of the CD or to sample some tunes visit www.joshuaengel.tv

Weizmann scientists develop vaccine to fight diabetes

By CINDY SHER
JUF News

CHICAGO — Researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel have developed a vaccine to stop the progression of juvenile diabetes, also known as Type I diabetes mellitus or insulin-dependent diabetes.

The team of scientists, led by former Chicagoan Irun Cohen, found that injecting sick mice with a peptide fragment called p277 halts the progression of the disease.

Diabetes is a chronic illness related to elevated blood sugar levels, in which the body doesn't properly produce or use insulin – the hormone necessary to convert sugar, starches, and other foods into energy.

Between 120 to 140 million people suffer from diabetes worldwide, according to the Weizmann Institute. The number of juvenile diabetes cases is on the rise and can be devastating to a young sufferer, said Cohen, an honours graduate of Northwestern University Medical School.

"There is certainly great discomfort in having to take insulin shots several times a day and the disease can be very debilitating to a young person," he said.

Type I diabetes is an autoimmune disorder in which the immune system mistakenly attacks the body's own insulin-producing pancreatic cells. Attacking the cells reduces and eventually eliminates the body's insulin production. Type I diabetes and severe Type II diabetes – a metabolic disorder – require sufferers to take insulin injections.

The piece of molecule – the p277 peptide that the Weizmann scientists have discovered – trains the immune system to stop attacking. "We've taken an important step forward because we have shown that it is possible in a very safe and specific way to 'talk' to the immune system and get it to behave properly," Cohen explained.

Based on the diabetes research at the Weizmann Institute, Peptor, an Israeli biopharmaceutical company, has created an experimental drug called DiaPep277 to prevent or treat Type I diabetes. Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical School and Peptor Ltd. researchers recently conducted a clinical study in which they proved that DiaPep277 successfully arrests the progression of the disease in newly diagnosed patients.

In the study of 35 participants, 18 patients received DiaPep277 injections at the start of the study, at one month, and at six months; the other 17 patients took three injections of a placebo during the course of the study.

Those who took the drug prevented or delayed the attack on their immune system, which was made apparent by the increased level of their body's own insulin production. As a result, they needed fewer insulin injections. The patients who received the placebo, by contrast, required an increased number of insulin injections. No patients involved in the study suffered significant side effects from the drug.

Next, Cohen and his team of scientists must learn how to optimize treatment and ensure the vaccine's safety. The Food and Drug Administration has approved clinical drug trials in the United States, but there are still many other hurdles to climb before the drug can gain approval, according to Cohen.

The Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, is one of the leading centres of scientific research and graduate study in the world. Scientists, researchers, technicians, engineers and students examine ways to combat disease and hunger, protect the environment, and find alternative sources of energy, among other projects.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have a newborn and I am wondering if you could tell me how to sterilize bottles.

A. I'm glad you asked this because many new moms don't know the right way. All pieces of the bottle, as wel as the tongs you'll use to remove the parts from the boiling water, must be washed in soapy water and then sterilized. To sterilize put all parts (including the nipple, collar, cap and bottle) into a pot, cover with water, bring to a boil, cover with a lid and let it boil 10 minutes. Remember to return to turn it off. Remove lid, let cool and remove with sterile tongs.

Q. I have been told that my LDL (bad) cholesterol is high. What can I do?

A. First, it is essential to achieve a healthy weight and to exercise regularly. Next, reduce saturated fat like that in red meat, baked goods, butter, cream and cheese. Increase fibre using bran, oats, fruits and vegetables and legumes such as chick peas, lentils, kidney beans, black beans. This will be an excellent start. Then have your doctor re-test your cholesterol in six months.

Jewish Rehab not just a place to rest anymore

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At the Kolber Pavilion of the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital (JRH) in Chomedey, researchers spend their days studying the mechanics of what most of us take for granted – walking.

Using equipment and computer software they designed to test subjects' posture and gait, the researchers are slowly learning what is lacking in patients who suffer neurological damage from, for example, a stroke or Parkinson's disease.

The JRH research centre is world-renowned for its invention of a body-weight support system that allows those re-learning how to walk to gradually increase the weight on their legs by letting a harness hold them up. Actor Christopher Reeves adapted the system for his rehabilitation following a spinal-cord injury that left him paralyzed.

The research team is also examining dizziness, another problem that affects balance, notably in the elderly and those with traumatic brain injuries.

The JRH plans to open a clinic to treat the malfunction of the vestibular system in the inner ear that causes dizziness.

"Of all the new programs in rehabilitation that we are presently working on, none is as unique, innovative and has the most potential for national and international recognition as our vestibular program," said Cathy Rabinovitch, director of the JRH Foundation.

Rabinovitch said the vestibular rehabilitation clinic will be the first of its kind in Canada and the JRH plans to construct an addition to house it.

Montreal hosts JCC Maccabi Games next August

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The YM-YWHA Montreal Jewish Community Centre (JCC) will for the first time be one of the host sites of the annual JCC Maccabi Games, Aug.18 to 23, organizers announced recently.

Martin Schwartz, games chair, said that the games are expected to draw about 1,600 athletes aged 13 to 16. About 300 of them will be from Montreal.

Schwartz said that organizing the event will require a substantial amount of money, and will test logistical problem-solving skills to the limit.

It will also need a network of thousands of volunteers, donors, and sponsors to bring the whole thing together.

"We have to realize the size and the scope of it," Schwartz said at a ceremony at the Ben Weider JCC to launch the event.

"Athletes alone will consume over 40,000 bottles of water," he said.

Schwartz stressed the need for community members to support the games, through sponsorship, volunteering or serving as one of an anticipated 600 host families.

Speakers at the launch emphasized the extent to which the games have grown since the first Memphis edition in 1982.

Those games drew only 300 athletes, including 40 from Montreal.

By comparison, Montreal will be one of five cities playing host to the games, which have often served as a springboard for athletes to the Maccabiah Games held every four years in Israel (the next are in 2005).

The honorary chair in Montreal is outgoing Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon.

The other cities will be Baltimore, Md., Memphis, Tenn., Omaha, Neb., and Springfield, Mass.

Altogether, the cities will see an expected total of 5,500 athletes coming from the United States, Canada, Mexico, South America, Australia and Great Britain, not counting hundreds of coaches and crew members.

The Montreal event will be notable for these features:

- The opening ceremonies will take place at the Molson Centre;
- The games will take place one year after the $20-million revamping and expansion of the Y, which made it feasible to use the facility as host site;
- It will be the first international sports competition to take place in the new, "merged" Montreal;
- The games are expected to inject about $1.5 million into the Montreal economy; and
- The games will also include a Day of Caring/Day of Sharing, a time-out day for athletes to volunteer within the Jewish community out of the Judaic spirit of tikkun olam and tzedakah.

Bronfman Jewish Education Centre executive director Shlomo Shimon, and Linda Kislowicz, newly named executive director of the Y, are serving as the co-ordinators of the games' Judaic component.

The sports action, which will take place in Montreal as well as its boroughs, will include baseball, basketball, bowling, golf, inline hockey, soccer, swimming, table tennis and tennis.

Cummings told the crowd that the games will "enable the community to come together as one, and be a life-affirming experience for the thousands involved."

Howard Berish, who is serving as Schwartz's associate chair, said that the estimated costs of the games locally will be $700,000 to $800,000, most of which will come from the fees participants pay to compete, and from fund-raising among private and corporate sponsors. FEDERATION CJA is also providing a certain level of funding.

As the months count down to next August, the games' organizing committee will also be on the lookout for all forms of equipment and other supplies.

Berish's own involvement came from having children who competed at previous JCC Maccabi Games.

"It's fantastic," he said. "The ambience, the feeling all over the continent."

In addition to the volunteer committee, among those who will help co-ordinate the games at the staff level will be the Y's Tracey Winter, who competed at the inaugural event in 1982, as well as Y veteran staffers Nehal Nassif and Diane Shea.

Potential volunteers or sponsors of the games can call 737-6551, local 514 or 519.

The Web site – www.montrealmaccabi.com – has information for host families and volunteers.

Canberra victory earns Smashnova second title in two weeks

By ILANA BERGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CANBERRA, Australia — Israel's Anna Smashnova made it back-to-back WTA tour titles last weekend with a 7-5, 7-6 (7-2) finals win over top-seeded Thai player Tamarine Tanasugarn at the $110,000 Canberra Women's Classic.

Smashnova, 25, won her third WTA title last week in Auckland, N.Z., and added a fourth after a stuttering start against Tanasugarn, who broke serve in the first game.

The first four games went against serve until Smashnova held to lead 3-2 and then the games went with serve until the Israeli broke Tanasugarn in the last to take the set.

Smashnova, who had a career-high ranking of No. 36 before slipping to No. 87 last year, said she played her best tennis in last weekend's final and was getting back on a roll.

Smashnova, 25, rose to 69 in the rankings after last week's success. In the semi-final game, she beat home player Amanda Graham 7-5, 6-2.

Most notable in Smashnova's run of 10 straight victories is the fact that she has not conceded a set in any of her matches.

In the new rankings set to be published soon, the Israeli No. 1 should move up to around 50.

As a result of the draw, Smashnova was scheduled to meet Slovakia's Katarina Srebotnik, ranked 104, in the first round of the Australian Open this week, and if she advanced, then in the following round, she could face France's Amelie Mauresmo, No. 9 in the world, who is seeded seventh.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

About Food

Dear Norene

The Tastes of Jewish Tradition (JCC of Milwaukee, $26.95 US, 298 pp) is a delightful book for the whole family. An excellent resource, it contains activities, crafts and stories for 11 Jewish holidays. The 125 delicious recipes include Honey Pecan Crusted Chicken, Moroccan Couscous and Challah with a Twist. To order, call 1-888-644-1847.

On Tu b'Shvat (the new year of the trees), which falls on Jan. 28 this year, it is customary to eat fruits grown in Israel, particularly the seven species mentioned in the Bible: "a land of wheat and barley, of vines, figs and pomegranates, a land of olive trees, dates and honey" (Deuteronomy 8:8).

A typical meal includes symbolic foods that can be eaten entirely (apples, strawberries, grapes), those with inedible pits but edible outsides (apricots, dates, cherries, peaches, plums) or those with inedible outsides but edible insides (oranges, walnuts, pomegranates, watermelon). Here are 2 recipes from the book for your enjoyment!

MUSHROOM BARLEY SOUP

1 medium onion, peeled and quartered
1 lb. mushrooms, rinsed and dried
1 ½ tbsp. margarine
6 cups vegetable soup stock (fresh or canned)
⅓ cup pearl barley
¼ tsp. black pepper
¼ tsp. thyme
1 bay leaf
3 tbsp. wine
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. soy sauce
⅛ cup parsley

In a food processor, slice onion; set aside. Slice mushrooms; set aside.

Melt margarine in a 3-quart pot. Sauté onion over medium heat until onion absorbs margarine. Add mushrooms. Cook over high heat stirring constantly for 5 minutes. Add stock, barley, pepper, thyme, bay leaf, wine, garlic. Bring to a boil; simmer covered until barley is tender, about 45 minutes. Stir in soy sauce and simmer 5 minutes more.

Remove bay leaf. Add parsley. Serves 6 to 8.

APRICOT CHICKEN WITH CRANBERRY OPTION

This easy, impressive dish can also be made for Passover.

2 lbs. chicken pieces, with or without bones and skin
12 oz. jar apricot jelly
1 small bottle (8 oz.) Western-style French dressing
1 package dry onion soup mix
½ cup dry white wine
1 cup dried apricots (or more)

Mix all ingredients together except chicken. Pour mixture over chicken and marinate in fridge for at least an hour or overnight. Preheat oven to 350 degrees F. Bake for 1 hour for boneless breasts, 1 1/2 hours for bone-in breasts.

Cranberry Option: (Stickier, but with a wonderful flavor.) Omit apricot jelly, wine and dried apricots. Add 16 oz. can of whole cranberries, 1 cup dark French or Russian dressing and 1/2 package onion soup mix. Serves 6.

THE ROBINSON FAMILY
INSTITUTE OF JEWISH LEARNING

a program of

Chabad @ Flamingo

What is The Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning?

Our modern age is defined by the explosion of technology and information, and the pathway of knowledge is now more accessible than ever. Yet, a remarkably staggering number of Jews know very little about the important fundamentals of Jewish life. The institute offers a program of serious Jewish learning designed to meet the needs of our diverse Jewish community. The institute strikes a fine balance by providing an engaged and intellectual climate for learning, while simultaneously presenting course material at a comfortable level and pace.

OBJECTIVES:

- To provide a stimulating and vibrant atmosphere that encourages questions, dialogue, and critical thinking.
- To effectively upgrade Jewish knowledge and awareness.
- To grow with and respond to the learning needs of our diverse Jewish community.

On behalf of the Board of Directors,
Rabbi Mendel Kaplan
Ora Bigio

THE FACULTY

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan – Rabbi Kaplan spent his youth studying at Yeshivot in close proximity to the internationally revered Lubavitcher Rebbe of righteous memory. Upon graduating rabbinical seminary in NYC, he assumed a rabbinic internship in Los Angeles. Subsequently he held several postings in Buenos Aires (Argentina), Petersburg (Russia), Milwaukee, Detroit and Jerusalem. Currently he is the executive director of Chabad @ Flamingo, and the spiritual leader of it's Family Shul. The Rabbi is a regular guest on two local television shows, and lectures in and around the GTA

Mrs. Chaya Perman – Mrs. Perman and her husband Moshe have been emissaries of the Lubavitcher Rebbe in Venezuela for 28 years. Chaya is an author, educator, and instructor and the mother of eight lovely children, two of whom are expanding on their parents' work in South America. She has written extensively and co-edits today's largest Jewish Spanish magazine, "Rumbo a tu Judaismo". Chaya divides her time between Toronto and Caracas. She has become involved in various special needs groups and consults to families with special needs children. Most importantly, she has made Pesach for her community for over 20 years.

Mrs. Chavi Rappaport – Mrs. Rappaport was raised in NYC, upon graduating high school with honours, she enrolled in a student exchange program and majored in education and Judaic Studies in Israel and the United States. She went on to graduate Beth Rivka Teachers College with honours. Before immigrating to Canada she taught English studies at several high schools in the NY metropolitan area. Since her arrival in Toronto 1989 Chavi has been teaching Judaic subjects at local high schools and teachers seminaries, and regularly lectures in the GTA on a variety of Jewish topics.

Rabbi Dr. Leo Steiner – Dr. Steiner is a registered clinical psychologist who currently works with victims of trauma. He has held positions at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, the Crisis Unit of Toronto's East General Hospital and York Central Hospital. Dr. Steiner has worked extensively with First Nations peoples and prison populations in Kingston Penitentiary and Prison for Women. He is also an ordained Rabbi and teaches several weekly Torah classes in and around the GTA During the past decade, he has officiated at numerous congregations as well.

Mrs. Ester Zirkind – Mrs. Zirkind was born and raised in London, England. She graduated high school with honours from Lubavitch House Schools, went on to attend the renowned Kfar Chabad Teachers Seminary in Israel, where she specialized in Judaic studies, before completing her studies at the Beth Rivkah Academy in New York. Esther has been teaching Jewish studies, including history, chassidut, "Ethics of our Fathers", women's studies, Chumash (bible studies with commentary in the original) in high schools and adult education facilities in England, United States and Canada for more than two decades. She is currently completing a degree in educational psychology at York University.

I travel a lot to the US, and lately I found myself scheduling my trips around the classes schedule (not vise versa as I used to do at the beginning). I attended many seminars in my life; I ran an IBM reseller computer company. IBM is known for scheduling conferences with world famous speakers – self motivators – such as Tony Robbins, Zig Ziegler and others. It is very hard to impress me with good speakers, but to my pleasant surprise, the speakers in my class did not fall short of any speaker I ever met.

Debbie Tadmore

Rabbi Kaplan's five-week course on "Making the most of your relationships" was one of the most enjoyable and insightful classes I've been to in a long time.
Topics included: defining a relationship and defining love. The detail was interesting from several perspectives such as:
- Judaism
- Current events
- Professional and Psychological

The classes were very informal and exceptionally interactive which allowed everyone the chance to participate. This class would be great for anyone looking to improve any of the relationships in their life. These may include spousal relationships, parent/child relationships or the toughest of all… Dating.
The Rabbi provides you with functional tools to effectively manage the myriad problems that life's relationships throw at you daily.

Cindy Tisspiat

My husband and I find the courses to be informative, instructive and entertaining, as well as spiritually uplifting. Rabbi Kaplan has that unique and rare gift which makes attending his lectures inspiring and meaningful. The courses have depth and the instruction is of the highest quality. It is truly wonderful that this opportunity for adult education exist in our neighborhood. I wholeheartedly recommend the courses offered by Chabad Flamingo to anyone who has an interest in their Jewish roots.

David Rosman, OB/GYN, York Central Hospital
Caryl Rosman, Psychiatric Social worker, homemaker

"The course on Mysticism was nor only stimulating to my intellect, but enriched my general understanding of Judaism. These courses are a definite must for Jewish learning…"

Norman L. Epstein, Emergency Physician, Credit Valley Hospital

Birthright Israel experience

6,000 participate, including 800 Canadians

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert is an adept politician and a capable public speaker, though he could hardly be mistaken for a rock star.

Yet when he left the dais of the Binyanei Ha'uma (Israel Convention Centre) following an address to hundreds of Birthright Israel participants, he might have been mistaken for one.

Inspired by his call for Jewish solidarity and for Jerusalem to remain as Israel's eternal capital, many young people mobbed him as he left the auditorium. Among those vying for a minute of his time were a group of Canadians who already had spent a week touring the Jewish State.

Like the other Birthright participants who had given Olmert a standing ovation, the group felt the mayor's comments further reinforced what they'd already experienced while touring the Holy Land – love for Israel, attachment to Jerusalem and Jewish solidarity.

The group gushed with enthusiasm as they described to The CJN their time in Israel, particularly the way it brought them together and forged personal relationships they said would last a lifetime.

To Birthright participants interviewed by The CJN, the experience was meaningful in a variety of ways. For some, it was the beauty of the country, while for others it was the spirituality of Jerusalem. Others cited the lust for life displayed by typical Israelis. Some felt more connected to their Jewish roots.

Now in its third year, Birthright brings young Jews, between 18 and 26, to Israel for the first time as part of an organized tour.

Conceived by philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, Birthright aims to strengthen Jewish identity and solidarity with Israel by giving a free trip to Israel as a personal birthright to all young Jews. So far, 25,000 people have taken advantage of the offer.

The News in Brief

Canada

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several Jewish Canadians were appointed last week to the Order of Canada. Promoted to companion, the order's highest rank, were Reuben Cohen of Moncton for voluntary service, and Phyllis Lambert of Montreal for architecture. Promoted to officers were Bluma Appel of Toronto for voluntary service and Samuel Belzberg of Vancouver for philanthropy. Appointed as an officer was Alvin Gerald Libin of Calgary for business. Appointed as members were Carole Grafstein and Gerald Halbert of Toronto for voluntary service, and Roel Buck of Toronto for industry, business and commerce.

Israel

Argentine Emergency

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency for Israel plans to expand its operations in Argentina. Agency officials say they plan to put the organization on emergency footing to accommodate increased demands by Argentine Jews to immigrate to Israel. Agency chair Sallai Meridor, back from a fact-finding trip to Argentina, said last week the economic situation for Argentina's 200,000 Jews is "very grave."

Jobless Rate

JERUSALEM — Israel has the second-highest unemployment rate among Western nations. Based on a survey of 30 industrialized countries, Israel came in behind Spain, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported reported last week. In October 2001 figures, unemployment in Israel was 9.4 per cent, compared with Spain's 13 per cent.

Intifadah Costs

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian uprising has cost Israel more than $3 billion (US) since it erupted in September 2000. According to figures released by the Bank of Israel, the economic damage has totaled about four per cent of Israel's Gross Domestic Product.

World

Iranian Jew Freed

TEHRAN — Iran last week released another Jew who was convicted of spying for Israel. Faramarz Kashi, whose five-year jail sentence had been reduced to three years, was the second of 10 Iranian Jews convicted in July 2000 of spying for Israel to be released. The time Kashi served while awaiting trial counted as part of his sentence. Ramin Nematizadeh, who was released in March, was the the first of the 10 to be freed. The defendants received sentences ranging from four to 13 years. Western Jewish groups say all are now eligible for release, and have called on Iranian leaders to free the remaining eight detainees.

JDL Charges

LOS ANGELES — A leader and a member of the Jewish Defense League have been indicted. JDL chair Irv Rubin, a former Montrealer, and member Earl Krugel, face federal charges of plotting to bomb a southern California mosque and a U.S. congressman's office. If convicted, they could face life in prison.

Documents Online

TRENTON, N.J. — Documents that helped convict Nazi war criminals and then gathered dust for decades have begun appearing in an online college law journal. The first installment, published by the Rutgers Journal of Law and Religion, lays out a Nazi plan to eliminate Christianity and convert its followers to an Aryan philosophy. New documents – taken from 148 volumes of personal papers and records kept by Gen. William J. Donovan during the Nuremberg trials – will be posted every six months, along with commentary from scholars, at www.lawandreligion.com.

Jewish 'Nobel'

NEW YORK — A group of anonymous Jews from Latin America has established the first "Jewish Nobel Prize." The award will be given to Jews who have excelled in culture and art, social sciences, liberal arts, applied sciences and Judaism, according to the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. Each winner will receive $1 million (US). Nominations for candidates are slated to take place over the next few months.

Teetotalers Rally

MOSCOW — Anti-Semitism pervaded a recent anti-alcohol demonstration in Russia. Teetotalers held signs saying "If you drink wine and beer, you are a lackey of Tel Aviv" and yelled anti-Semitic slogans.

French Rally

PARIS — About 1,000 people demonstrated in France this month against recent anti-Semitic attacks. The protest took place in the Paris suburb of Creteil, site of a recent firebombing of a Jewish school. Among those addressing the crowd was Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld, who said French officials "underestimated" the seriousness of the attacks.

Jewish Museum

WARSAW — Poland's prime minister has announced the creation of a Jewish Museum in Warsaw. Speaking Jan. 10 to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Leszek Miller said the Museum of the History of Polish Jews will be built on the site of the city's old Jewish quarter.

New Law Could Extend Art Claims

PRAGUE — Jews around the world may be granted unlimited time to claim works of Nazi-confiscated art now in Czech hands.

Deputy Prime Minister Pavel Rychetsky says he will submit to the Czech cabinet an amendment to the current law, which expires at the end of this year, with the goal of pushing the new law through parliament soon.

A government commission has identified thousands of paintings and art objects in the hands of state galleries and museums across the Czech Republic that belonged to Jews before World War II.

The Czech Federation of Jewish Communities convinced the government that more time was needed to lay claim to the looted works.

The Czech ministry of culture has set up a list of artworks identified as confiscated by the Nazis, at www.restitution-art.cz. Unlike other Czech restitution laws, non-Czech citizens are permitted to make claims.

Coalition will advocate for home-care funding

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have been instrumental in forming a multicultural coalition to advocate for increased home-care funding.

The coalition, Communities for Home Health Care, comprised of such groups as the Italian National Congress, the Portuguese Congress, the Armenian community, the Hellenic community, the Islamic Society of North America and the Catholic Church, is focusing on the present crisis in the delivery of home health care services in Ontario.

Simon Rosenblum

Michael Scheinert

It is calling on the Ontario government to restore a previous financial commitment to home health care.

Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy for CJC, Ontario region, said in 1998 the provincial government committed itself to providing $550 million over six years to meet the challenge of home-care needs.

"Mid-way, however, the budget line was frozen and the annual increments were stopped at $275 million," he said.

The coalition is demanding a restoration of the original funding allocation so that money can be allowed to flow into the system, Rosenblum said.

Michael Scheinert, president and CEO of Circle of Care, among the largest providers of home-care services in the province, the largest provider of personal home-care services in North York and the largest provider to the Jewish community in the GTA, said that although services have diminished across Ontario, North York, which has the largest senior population in the province, has suffered the most. "Funding depends on the number of people in the community, not on the number of people who require services," he said.

The community care access centres "really made every effort to sustain services, but the inevitable consequence of what they were obliged to do by the Ministry of Health was the reduction of services and the erosion of care."

The erosion of these services has not been in the spotlight, he said, because home care is "largely invisible. There are no prominent champions for the provision of home care. It does not register on the Richter scale."

Rosenblum said that in the last year, organizations such as the United Way and the Canadian Association of Retired Persons have begun to raise their voice about the crisis, but they could not prevent the deterioration of services.

"There is no champion in the government, in bureaucracy or within the sector. Home-care organizations do not have the same impact as the board of directors in a hospital," he said.

The home-care labour force, said Scheinert, is 99.5 per cent women, and there is a pay equity issue between those who work in institutions and those who provide home care.

"The labour force has no significant voice and no impact on policy."

Previously, said Scheinert, home-care services were 70 per cent chronic care cases, and 30 per cent acute care. "Now, because people are being pushed out of hospital earlier, the situation is reversed.

"Put that fact together with the fact that we are living in an aging population, and we can see that we have a big problem."

Keith Ray, a member of the UJA Federation social planning and allocations committee, said that as things stand, people cannot be released from hospital because there is no home care available for them, so hospitals and emergency rooms are jammed. "The government has to pay now or pay later; they have taken the short-term view."

The coalition is planning a press conference at the end of January, and plan to meet with cabinet ministers and MPPs. On Feb. 18, there will be a meeting at Bernard Betel Centre, in which speakers will focus on the human side of the cutbacks.

Tribunal rules against Internet hate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a long-anticipated ruling that expands the reach of Canada's human rights legislation to the Internet, a tribunal has ordered Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel to remove material from his Web site that is likely to expose Jews to hatred or contempt.

Last week, a two-person human rights tribunal found that material on the "Zundelsite" "viciously targeted" Jews "on the basis of their religious and cultural associations."

Despite the ruling's strong language, its practical impact on the Zundelsite may be limited. Zundel moved to Tennessee early last year, selling his Toronto home and winding up his affairs here. Nevertheless, the decision could have practical consequences.

The tribunal noted that its decision provides a "symbolic value in the public denunciation" of Zundel's Holocaust-denial views as well as an educational and deterrent benefits.

Sabina Citron, the Holocaust survivor who launched the complaint against Zundel more than five years ago, called the decision "a small victory" and "a good first step."

She contended, however, that Zundel should have been charged under the Criminal Code's anti-hate provisions for promoting hatred against Jews.

Ed Morgan, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "I'm quite pleased they found that Holocaust-denial is the equivalent of hate propaganda" against Jews.

The era they ushered in

The melancholy we felt at last week's death of Frank Shuster was at a number of levels.

First and foremost, of course, was the passing away of a fine, thoughtful and gentle individual.

Then there was the fact that along with his partner, the inimitable Johnny Wayne, he blazed a trail for all aspiring Canadian artists, not only comedians and humorists, in the quickly expanding, post-World War II, television-age of North American communications. They did so, distinctly and proudly, as Canadians.

In the heaving ocean of American market forces, they sailed into the wind, against the current, proving to fellow Canadians who also wished to hold fast against the deluge from down south, that it could be done.

But they were also, unmistakably, the avatars of Jewish custom, Jewish language, Jewish behaviour and Jewish values which they openly, unashamedly incorporated into their comedy routines. Rare was the sketch, on radio or on television, that did not include Yiddishisms or other Yiddish shtick.

They had stepped from the teeming, vibrant Jewish milieu of Toronto's Harbord Collegiate onto Ed Sullivan's stage and the CBC's airwaves and telecasts.

Together, Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster helped carve from the hard granite of intolerant, exclusivist Canadian society the image of a new face for Canadian identity and a more tolerant, inclusivist culture.

But it was not mere serendipity that allowed them to do so.

Like the path they paved for artists who came after them, their path into a newer, better Canada was paved by a cadre of committed, determined leaders who laboured on behalf of Canadian Jews both before and after World War II.

The record of that labour was recently presented by Irving Abella in his farewell address as president of the Canadian Historical Association.

Entitled Jews, Human Rights and the Making of a New Canada, the speech moved briskly with great force and drama across Canada's history from the early '20s to the early '60s. Abella pulled no punches.

"The Canada of the first half of the last century and particularly from the 1920s through the 1940s was a foreboding place for Jews, as it was for most immigrants. Closed to most of the world by racist immigration laws that divided the peoples of the world into preferred and [mostly] non-preferred, Canada was a country permeated with xenophobia, nativism and anti-Semitism. The Jew was the pariah of Canadian society, demeaned, denounced and discriminated against.

"For Canadian Jews in these years, quotas and restrictions were a way of life."

Abella painted an unembellished portrait of pre-war Canadian society. Its colours were mostly dark.

He also provided a thumbnail sketch of the anti-Semitism that "permeated" the country, citing seven different reasons for its prevalence at that time. To illustrate the absurdity of the prejudice and the hardship it occasioned, Abella chronicled the example of "a young, brilliant law student who arrived back in Canada in the 1930s fresh from an outstanding academic record at Harvard.

"His applications to teach at the universities of Toronto and Manitoba were rejected because he was Jewish. He found it difficult to rent a home in Toronto because many of the areas of the city were restricted."

The "young, brilliant law student" was Bora Laskin, destined to become, one day, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

After the war, galvanized by the unutterable horrors visited upon the Jews of Europe and by the example and epoch-making courage of the Jews of Palestine, Canadian Jewish leaders "chose to launch an all-out offensive against discriminatory practices in Canada."

Abella briefly described some of the many fronts in that offensive and the leaders who led the charge. He concluded:

"Thus, by the 1960s, Canada had turned the corner. For Jews, as well as for this country's other minorities, that decade was a watershed. Before it existed the old Canada, parochial, nativist, exclusionary; beyond it, a new Canada was taking shape, a Canada of diversity, colour, vibrancy, a Canada of open minds rather than closed doors, a Canada in which Jews and other ethnic groups were quickly becoming part of the Canadian mainstream, and were seen as part of the solution rather than as part of the problem.

"The decade began with Canada finally repealing its odious racist immigration laws and opening itself up to all the world's nations... And it was in the 1960s that all of the barriers, restrictions and quotas against Jews crumbled, one by one, sector by sector. At long last, after 200 years in the country, the Jewish community would be able to play out its dreams and become an integral part of the very same Canadian society that had excluded it for so long."

"Playing out [their] dreams," to use Abella's words, was exactly what Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster did on a wide variety of stages and for audiences breathing the fresher, reinvigorated air of a post-war era. That era, and the "new Canada" they helped usher in, is the Canada in which we and our children live today so freely and with so much possibility.

Historian warns against beatifying Pius XII

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Vatican's dialogue with Jews would be gravely compromised if it decided to beatify Pope Pius XII, a Canadian member of an international historians' panel warned last week.

"Beatification would be extremely damaging," said Michael Marrus, a University of Toronto history professor who sits on a now-suspended panel that had been charged with investigating the Roman Catholic church's conduct during the Holocaust.

An expert on the Holocaust, Marrus urged Pope John Paul II to refrain from beatifying Pope Pius XII – beatification is the first step toward sainthood – because historians have not reached a consensus about his wartime role and policy.

Some historians claim Pius XII was, in fact, indifferent to Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews.

"This issue, in the opinion of most historians, has not been resolved," said Marrus, author of The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews.

"Unquestionably, beatification would have a negative effect on Roman Catholic-Jewish relations, and in the wider world," he added.

Marrus disagreed with a recent comment by Seymour Reich, a prominent American Jewish leader, that the suspension of the historians' panel could "derail" Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

The Jewish and Catholic historians suspended the panel, established in 1999, when they concluded the Vatican would deny them access to Vatican documents published after 1923 and thus tarnish their credibility.

'Guardedly hopeful that the Vatican understands the seriousness of this issue'

Subsequently, two of the Jewish panelists resigned, citing a lack of co-operation by the Vatican.

Marrus, the last remaining Jewish panelist, suggested that while the archival issue remains relevant, the broader matter turning on Pope Pius XII's possible beatification is even more important.

He said he is guardedly hopeful that the Vatican understands the seriousness of this issue.

Last summer, Rev. Peter Gumpel, a Jesuit priest responsible for gathering documents to support Pope Pius XII's beatification, denounced the historians, claiming they had launched a "slanderous campaign" against the church.

Michael Marrus

The historians' panel was originally set up by the the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations and the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews.

Recently, Walter Cardinal Kasper, head of the Vatican commission, said he does not regard the committee, chaired by Reich, as "an exclusive or as a major partner" and that he would look for other experts to continue the panel's work.

Responding to Kasper's statements, Marrus said the historians' preliminary report, released in 2000, is in the hands of the Vatican and awaits a reply.

"That's the way forward, rather than searching for new partners who would be closer to present opinion in the Vatican."

But Marrus conceded the panel has run its course.

"It's finished. It's over and done."

Marrus said he has no regrets about having joined and said he is still in touch with its Roman Catholic members.

He said he disagrees with a recent observation by Rabbi David Rosen, the American Jewish Committee's Jerusalem-based director of interreligious affairs, that Jewish-Catholic ties have never been better.

"I wouldn't put it quite that way," said Marrus, who is also dean of graduate studies at the University of Toronto.

"There has been a remarkable improvement in Jewish-Catholic relations, and a lot of credit for that should go to Pope John Paul II.

"But there are issues that need attention, primarily the role of the Vatican during the Holocaust.

"It needs a resolution."

Frank Shuster remembered

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

TORONTO — Frank Shuster was remembered as a caring father, a Canadian gentleman and a great comedian at a memorial service held last week.

The surviving member of the Wayne and Shuster comedy team died last Sunday of pneumonia at Mount Sinai Hospital at age 85.

Shuster, a legendary figure in Canadian comedy, was born in Toronto and raised in Niagara Falls. After his father closed his movie theatre, the Colonial, in 1930, the family moved back to Toronto where he met Lou Weingarten – later to be known as Johnny Wayne – at Harbord Collegiate Institute.

There the two began a 50-year career together.

They were an army touring act during World War II and wrote and performed comedy for CBC radio and television beginning in the 1940s. They also appeared a record 67 times on the Ed Sullivan Show and were twice voted the best comedy team on the continent by U.S. television critics. In 1997, Shuster was named an officer of the Order of Canada.

After a private service for close family, Shuster's friends and colleagues gathered at Holy Blossom Temple to laugh and cry as they heard short anecdotes about his life.

His commitment to enduring partnerships was recalled in a touching eulogy written by his wife, Ruth, and delivered by Rabbi Gunther Plaut.

"His first partnership was with Johnny Wayne – an association that lasted 53 years," she noted.

Ruth recalled how her husband pulled himself together, despite a struggle with Parkinson's disease, to work on retrospectives of the Wayne and Shuster shows.

Frank Shuster

Rabbi Plaut, a neighbour and regular golf partner, joked that Shuster "was better at comics than he was at golf."

But Rabbi Plaut said Shuster's gift was his ability to bring laughter to anyone watching him, adding that he remembers watching Wayne and Shuster while in South Africa.

"Wayne and Shuster brought Canada to us."

Another important part of Shuster's life was his deep concern for social justice, Rabbi Plaut said.

Shuster's daughter, Rosalind, recalled her father's story about an American publicist who tried to persuade Wayne and Shuster to move to the United States.

"Canada is our home and we're happy here," she remembered her father saying.

"But there's more to life than happiness," the agent retorted.

Stephen Shuster recalled his father quipping that his Gemini Award for Life Achievement was really for making a living in Canadian show business.

In an interview, Stephen said show business was in his family's blood.

"My great-grandfather owned a theatre and hotel in Rotterdam, Holland," he said.

"My dad got his start in show business simulating gunshots by tapping a pencil on a microphone during screenings of silent Western movies in his father's theatre."

Director and producer Stan Jacobson, who was a close friend, said Shuster had a true Canadian spirit.

"When his friends were becoming doctors and lawyers, he and Johnny Wayne chose the less travelled road of show business in the 1930s."

In a phone interview, Jacobson said Wayne and Shuster never hid the fact they were Jews.

Jewish accents and Yiddishisms were thrown into many of their sketches. One skit about Russian ballerinas featured Madame Padeshve (Yiddish for sole of a foot).

The pair were often overheard speaking Yiddish to each other. In fact, Jacobson said, one of Ed Sullivan's assistants once asked Shuster who this guy oys geherst (did you hear) was because they referred to him so often.

But the comedians were also incredibly proud of their Canadian heritage, Jacobson said. In fact, Wayne requested that his coffin be draped in a Canadian flag.

After the service for Shuster, Alfie Scopp, who appeared on the Howdy Doody Show, said there was something universal about Shuster's humour that appealed to everyone.

"Frank will be remembered as a class act," Scopp said. "People liked him just because he was a genuinely nice guy."

Writer Pierre Berton and singer Maureen Forrester, who both attended the Holy Blossom service, said Shuster will be remembered as a Canadian icon.

Wayne and Shuster were great comic writers, Forrester said. "They were never vulgar."

Berton said the pair initiated a group style of comedy that influenced a long line of shows such as SCTV and Kids in the Hall.

He called Shuster's death "a great loss" to the community the duo served for more than 50 years.

In addition to his wife and two children, Shuster is survived by two sisters – Rose Kirsh and Geraldine Leder.

Shuster's daughter said that in his last years Shuster had been editing old sketches to make them more relevant to today's young people. The last retrospective was called Wayne and Shuster – the First 100 years.

Struggling with Parkinson's, Shuster's last few years were difficult, his family recalled.

One thing about her father, Rosalind said, is that "he was a class act. He knew when to exit."

CJC supports school board criticizing "unacceptable article"

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has supported a Toronto District School Board (TDSB) trustee's motion criticizing an article distributed by District 12 of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation (OSSTF).

CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan presented a deputation at last week's board meeting, in support of Gerri Gershon's motion regarding the article titled Why America is hated, which appeared in the December issue of D12 Voice, the OSSTF newsletter.

The article, which Morgan called a "deeply flawed, unbalanced and politically motivated diatribe that bears its anti-America and anti-Israel bias clearly and proudly," was recommended by the union as a teaching resource.

They supported the motion, Morgan said, because "the D12 Voice is an OSSTF communications vehicle that editorially presents issues, which, in the words of the editor, Doug Little, are not balanced and indeed carry a particular bias."

The motion was not considered at the meeting, but the board called a special meeting, which was scheduled for Jan. 21, to discuss the matter.

"As offensive as this may seem, D12 Voice has the right to conduct itself in this fashion as long as it is supported by its membership," said Morgan.

He added, however, that the newsletter does not have the right to dictate curriculum.

"It is our belief that teachers have an overwhelming responsibility to present information to their students in a fashion that is both balanced and honest.

"While the world outside of the classroom is often characterized by the clash of viewpoints and ideologies, students require balance in the classroom in order to develop the cognitive skills that will allow them to participate and purchase wisely in the marketplace of ideas that is our free and democratic society," said Morgan.

'Deeply flawed and politically motivated diatribe'

"[We believe] that the current debate on this brings into question the ability of all teachers in the TDSB to present classroom material in a fair and even-handed fashion.

"For this reason alone, it is critically important that the board move quickly to clearly state its position in favour of balance and fairness," he said.

He said CJC Ontario supports the notion that teachers be permitted to deal with controversial and sensitive issues. "We believe that this goal can best be accomplished by allowing curriculum professionals to develop proper materials to permit teachers to do their best work.

"Such materials will be free of ideology and will strive to present a balanced perspective on issues that are difficult and complex."

Curriculum development is not the responsibility of OSSTF, he said. "We support Trustee Gershon's motion because it speaks to the importance of balance, fairness and honesty in education."

Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC, Ontario region, said, "There is little doubt that Doug Little and CJC view the current situation in the Middle East from very different perspectives.

"Our differences on this matter are irrelevant. What is relevant is the fact that the D12 Voice crossed a very significant line when it advocated the use of [the article] as resource to stimulate classroom discussion."

When the matter first emerged, said Farber, "Mr. Little acknowledged, in correspondence to us, the lack of balance and objectivity in the article that had been published. His precise words were:

" 'We make no pretense of being objective. We do not have a balanced view of the Mike Harris regime. We do not have a balanced view of oppression anywhere. We side with the oppressed against the oppressor. We view America and Israel as its agent, as a prime oppressor in this case in the Middle East.' "

Farber said that this is "dogma plain and simple. If that is all it was, then CJC would likely have remained silent on the matter. But when dogma threatens to become a part of the curriculum, then action is required.

"We trust in the wisdom of the members of TDSB to send a clear message through their vote: that it recognizes that excellence in education begins with honesty in the curriculum and balance in the classroom."

Asked what would have made the article acceptable, Morgan said the article was presented with an introductory paragraph that said students wonder why Islam hates America.

"That paragraph followed by false history is completely unacceptable."

Farber declined to answer a trustee who asked whether the author of the article was Jewish, saying he was outraged by the question.

Governing by template

It is utterly inexcusable that in one of the richest provinces in Canada, in an advanced, highly sophisticated, highly technologized, western society such as Ontario in the year 2000, seven people died and some 2,300 became seriously ill because they drank the water in their homes. Justice Dennis O'Connor, the one-person commission of inquiry who investigated the reasons for the Walkerton, Ont., water disaster of the summer of 2000, agrees.

The tragedy "could have been prevented," he told the people of Walkerton last week as he delivered his report to them and to the people of Ontario. Like the incessant pealing of a heavy steel bell from a high steeple in the town square, O'Connor's words ring out for all citizens to hear, pounding at our conscience and piercing the heart.

He concluded that the tragedy was caused by the dishonesty and incompetence of the individuals who were in charge of monitoring the quality of the community's water supply and by the obstinate bullheadedness of the Ontario government. The Koebel brothers failed to detect the deadly bacteria poisoning the water. But the government of Ontario created the conditions where the brothers' incompetence, or worse, led inexorably to the sorrow and suffering that spilled so cruelly into the lives of the people of Walkerton.

O'Connor did not quantify the apportionment of blame. But he was unequivocal in finding blame. "It is simply wrong to say, as the government argued... that Stan Koebel or the Walkerton [Public Utilities Commission] were solely responsible for the outbreak or that they were the only ones who could have prevented it."

The culpability of the government came in three parts: It emasculated the Ministry of Environment (MOE) by eliminating almost a third of the ministry's staff and $200 million a year from the ministry's budget, thereby effectively disabling it from being able to catch the toxins coursing through Walkerton's water. It reduced the regulatory accountability applicable to the private sector into whose hands the government had devolved the potentially life-saving work of the MOE. And it dismissed out of hand the many alarms and warnings arising from its policies sounded by public servants and citizen watchdogs alike.

"Certainly, I... and the cabinet made no reductions in expenditures that we believed would affect the health and safety of any citizen in Ontario," Premier Mike Harris told the people of Walkerton last week. How trite and beside the point!

Had his cabinet made any budget reductions believing they would affect health and safety of Ontarians, then that would have been prima facie evidence of either criminal recklessness or criminal intent on their part. Of course the government intended no harm. But they were blinded to the foreseeability of harm by their slavish, unthinking dedication to a simplistic ideology that they used as a template, however ill fitting or unsuited, for all of their important responsibilities.

O'Connor pointed out that the government's first loyalty should have been to the well-being of Ontarians, not to its come-hell-or-high-poisoned-water approach to governing by template.

All governments of all jurisdictions in Canada should take notice.

Waiting for compensation

We are grateful to Sholom Hershkop for his letter (CJN, Dec. 20, 2001). He talks for many Holocaust survivors waiting for compensation. We are the ones who worked in the ghettos, in concentration camps or suffered much worse. The people who are supposed to distribute the money have been holding on to it for such a long time. Why are they doing that? Don't they feel a little guilty? Not many of us are left. What are they waiting for?

Thank you, Sholom, for talking about us, too.

Liberal-left death wish a luxury

In view of facts on the ground as they have unfolded over the past eight years... and especially the last two years, we are all very fortunate indeed that the more or less "liberal-left" point of view that was given lavishly disproportionate opportunity to expose itself is now thoroughly discredited in the eyes of the world. This applies not only to those events that impinge directly on Israel, but also domestically, especially with regard to certain issues such as "multi-culturalism," "race relations" and immigration policies that were hitheto considered beyond criticism.

Commenting on Kushner

In a recent Toronto lecture, Rabbi Harold Kushner observed that "[Since Sept.11] more people have recognized the need for God," since "God begins where human self-sufficiency ends" ("Sept. 11 changed people for good, says famed rabbi," CJN, Jan. 3).

In the light of my 1996 analysis of Kushner's thought (Theology and Theodicy: On Reading Harold Kushner, Modern Judaism, John Hopkins University Press), I would argue that according to Kushner's own thinking "human self-sufficiency," or better, self-reliance, begins, when God ends, and God ends very early on.

OSSTF newsletter inexcusable

I have seen the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation's (OSSTF) newsletter (CJN, Dec. 13, Dec. 20, 2001) and the inexcusably inflammatory talking points and think it was reprehensible and irresponsible for Doug Little to summarize the complexities of the Middle East situation in such a distorted way. Little implicitly acknowledges that the slanted worldview in the OSSTF newsletter reduces the incredibly complicated 50-year Arab/Israeli conflict into a fable of good guys fighting bad guys. But this is pedagogically necessary, Little claims, to counterbalance the arguments made by the simpleminded mainstream media, which is outrageously dominated by strident pro-Israel forces.

Perfect: rather than lower the temperature, Little comes up with selective points that further polarize the depressing situation. Obviously, he is following the Marxian idea that things can get better only if they first get worse.

Little says that his source is Z magazine but I can't help but wonder whether Z magazine got it from the textbooks used by the Palestinian Authority or the curriculum followed in Saudi Arabia. One thing is certain. If a teacher is willing to present the material in the way Little advises and perhaps prefers, he or she can be sure of steady employment as an educator in the religious schools anywhere in the Islamic world. But since Little earns his livelihood here in Canada, he ought to be more responsible, and if he wishes to inject himself into the debate, as a teacher, he ought to attempt to be an agent of compromise rather than someone who "does not have a balanced view." His attitude is disgraceful.

All terrorists should be condemned

The arrest in Los Angeles of two members of the lunatic fringe group, Jewish Defence League (JDL), will be applauded by all right-thinking Jews who unequivocally condemn any alleged acts of violence and terrorism. There actions are counterproductive and detrimental to Israel. The almost daily killings of Israeli civilians by Palestinian suicide bombers has made the world realize that the villains were Islamic terrorists and that Israel's retaliation was justified.

While in no way apologizing for or condoning the murderous intentions of the Jewish Defence League, it must be emphasized that they are not sanctioned by any country nor supported in any way by any legitimate Jewish organization. The condemnation of JDL will be unlike Muslim leaders who say, "The acts or deeds of Islamic terrorists were terrible, but..."

The restoration of the Sarajevo Haggadah

By BETH KAMPSCHROR

It had all the makings of a surgical procedure: tweezers, small scissors and other instruments laid out within reach, as expert Andrea Pataki sewed up the patient. But it wasn't surgery on a human being. The patient, rather, was the Sarajevo Haggadah, a 600-year-old book that is the most famous surviving Sephardi Jewish manuscript in the world.

"The 19th-century binding had to be repaired and stabilized, and the end papers – one was lost and the other was loose," said Austrian-born Pataki, who holds a degree from Germany's State Academy of Art and Design and has worked with rare and centuries-old manuscripts in both Israel and the United States.

Surprisingly, Pataki didn't have to touch the Haggadah's magnificently coloured illuminations. All the events of Genesis are depicted in vibrant reds, rich blues and other colours. Text letters are often highlighted with gold and lapis lazuli. Everything on the 109 pages of bleached calfskin dates from the mid-1300s. Pataki said the pictures are one reason the book is so rare.

"It has 34 full pages of illuminations, which is very rare," she said. "Normally illuminations are incorporated in the text. The whole book of Genesis is there, though it's a liturgical manuscript. And the colours are still good.

"I checked under a 25x microscope and I didn't see any flaking or powdering of the pigments, so I think they'll be fine. The overall condition is very good for its age."

The Haggadah doesn't just look good for its age. It looks good for all it's been through. Sephardi Jews fleeing King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella's Catholic Spain in 1492 brought the book with them, and there is evidence that it was in Italy around 1510. Jewish merchants from the now Croatian coastal city of Dubrovnik carried it with them through the barren hills of Herzegovina and into Ottoman-controlled Sarajevo sometime in the 18th century.

In 1894, a boy from Sarajevo's Kohen family sold the Haggadah to the Viennese museum for a few dozen florins, after his father's death left the family impoverished. The book was returned to Sarajevo when the National Museum was established later that decade.

The Haggadah miraculously survived three wars here in the 20th century, thanks to people of different ethnicities who knew the book's value for all Bosnians, as well as all of humanity.

A famous anecdote here illustrated how then-National Museum director Jozo Petrovic outsmarted a Nazi general who demanded the Haggadah after the Germans entered Sarajevo in April 1941.

"But Mr. General," Petrovic said. "One of your colonels came yesterday and took the book."

"What was his name?" the general said, suspicious.

"We were not allowed to ask," Petrovic said.

Petrovic managed to smuggle the Haggadah to a mountain village above Sarajevo, where it remained until the end of the war.

Nearly 50 years passed peacefully for both the Haggadah and the people of Sarajevo. But in April 1992, Bosnian Serb forces laid siege to the city, shelling and sniping at its citizens and 600 years of cultural history. The National Museum had been bombed more than 60 times by the beginning of June that year. The Muslim museum director was one of the people who dashed through sniper fire and exploding mortars to rescue the Haggadah. The war ended in 1995, but the Haggadah has remained in a Sarajevo bank vault since its rescue.

> 'The Haggadah miraculously survived three wars here in the 20th century'

Pataki said that signs of the book's history were visible; before it became a museum artifact a century ago, 'the Sarajevo Haggadah was in private use at springtime Passover seder dinners. The book contains prayers, seder rites, Torah readings and hymns that had been used for generations during Passover week.

"For seder evening they were always drinking and having a party around it, so you can see the signs of that, but that's something you never touch – it's part of the book's history," Pataki said.

Pataki, along with the inspector-general of France's libraries and a Jerusalem art historian, proposed the restoration project last April. The German government donated $20,000 to pay for the restoration, and the United Nations Trust Fund in Bosnia gave $50,000 to rebuild the Haggadah's climate-controlled room in the Sarajevo National Museum. The museum suffered heavy damage during the war and is still not entirely structurally sound.

"This is a complex project that has several components," said UN-Bosnia Trust Fund head Gary Manukyan. "The UN Mission in Bosnia-Herzegovina as a whole was soliciting funds for the Jewish community here, and the $50,000 was to renovate and secure the room at the National Museum."

The Haggadah's immense value – estimated in 1991 at $700 million (US) – was not the only reason that the project was approved, Manukyan said. Given Bosnia's recent history of warfare between ethnic groups, the UN Trust Fund is aiming to rebuild Bosnia's cultural treasures to promote the common cultural bonds that Croats, Jews, Muslims, Serbs and others here share.

"It's a kind of bringing cultures together," Manukyan said. "We're involved in the restoration of mosques, and the Orthodox Museum [in Sarajevo] was recently renovated. There was a big Jewish community before the war in Sarajevo. It's shrunk, of course, but of course they still have their society. We're trying to assist in this cultural renewal."

Sarajevo's Jewish cemetery, one of the most famous Sephardi burial grounds in the world, will also be reconstructed in another UN-affiliated project that will simultaneously restore the interior of Sarajevo's Orthodox Cathedral and reconstruct a destroyed 16th-century mosque in Foca and a destroyed Catholic church in Derventa. The cemetery was part of the front line during the 1992-95 war and has been de-mined but not renovated.

The World Bank, Bosnia's Jewish community, and others also donated to the Haggadah project, as did UN special representative Jacques Paul Klein. For 10 days in December, Pataki worked in the basement of Sarajevo's Union Bank under the watch of three museum officials and three Sarajevo police. The Haggadah is now ready to be displayed – along with other religious and cultural artifacts restored with UN Trust Fund donations, sometime this year – depending on when its room is finished.

"We're pushing for April, but how successful we'll be I don't know," Manukyan said.

Pataki has recommended that the Haggadah be displayed with a facsimile and a CD-ROM so that the book can be researched by scholars and art historians with a minimum of stress on the new binding.

"Or they could limit the time and people studying the manuscript – scholars, the public and art historians," Pataki said. "The climate conditions should be as stable as possible, because if you have lots of changes it's difficult for the manuscript."

Synagogue bloopers

In a usually serious world, there is still some fun to be found. To be sure, one has to look in strange places occasionally, but with a bit of luck, something will turn up that brings a smile to face and heart.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

On the Internet, I recently read a collection of bloopers that appeared in synagogue bulletins across the continent. As the collector of these items wrote, "even the spell checker would not have helped."

Here is a brief excerpt that, I hope, will amuse you as it has amused me:

- Don't let worry kill you. Let your synagogue help. Join us for oneg after services. Prayer and medication to follow. Remember in prayer the many who are sick of our congregation.
- For those of you who have children and don't know it, we have a nursery downstairs.
- We are pleased to announce the birth of David Weiss, the sin of Rabbi and Mrs. Abe Weiss.
- Thursday at 5 p.m., there will be a meeting of the Little Mothers Club. All women wishing to become Little Mothers, please see the rabbi in his private study.
- The ladies of Hadassah have cast off clothing of every kind and they may be seen in the basement on Tuesdays.
- Weight Watchers will meet at 7 p.m. at JCC. Please use the large double door at the side entrance.
- Rabbi is on vacation. Massages can be given to his secretary.
- The Men's Club is warmly invited to the oneg hosted by Hadassah. Refreshments will be served for a nominal feel.
- We are taking up a collection to defray the cost of the new carpet in the sanctuary. All those wishing to do something on the carpet will come forward and get a piece of paper.
- If you enjoy sinning, the choir is looking for you!

If you were amused by these bloopers, thank the unknown collector who put them on the Internet. I think that, in general, we would do well to put Jewish news, from time to time, in the category of enjoyment and pleasure. Being Jewish is more than suffering and playing the role of victim. Laughter is good medicine – both for individuals and for a people.

That's all for today, making this a column of fewer paragraphs than is my wont. My hope is that after reading the above, you'll start all over and enjoy "blooping." (It's a word they took out of the dictionary; or maybe it was never there.)

Don Quixotes or Bravehearts?

Anyone walking through Tel Aviv in mid-December could not fail to notice huge billboards in Hebrew, English and Arabic, proclaiming "Better the Pain of Peace than the Agony of War." What most people did not know was that the same posters appeared throughout areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority — in Gaza, Ramallah, Jenin, Tul Karem, and Jericho.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The public campaign is sponsored by the joint Israeli-Palestinian Forum of Bereaved Parents. Founded several years ago by Yitzhak Frankental, whose soldier son had been kidnapped and killed by Hamas, the forum advocates peace and negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians. The current campaign is unprecedented in its scope, scale and its simultaneous outreach to the Israeli and Palestinian publics.

The campaign was launched two months ago, on the sixth anniversary of Yitzhak's Rabin's assassination, with a controversial installation in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square entitled, The Human Toll of the Intifada. In a bold — and what some called a sacrilegious – step, 900 "coffins" were placed throughout the square to signify the number of Israeli and Palestinian casualties since October 2000. Since the Israeli authorities refused to allow the presence of Palestinian flags in the exhibit, 700 boxes (Palestinians) were draped in black sheets, and 200 (Israelis) in white sheets. The installation will soon be shown again – in the Palestinian Authority. Frankental says this time the coffins will be draped in Israeli and Palestinian flags.

The forum does not voice opinions on specific issues that could arise in any future talks — and this may be its weakness. However, its position, eloquently expressed by parents who have lost children, is simply that the only alternative to the cycle of violence and reprisals is a process of negotiations where differences can be confronted. Today, the forum seeks to reinvigorate the Israeli peace camp, which has been virtually silenced since the outbreak of the intifadah in September 2000.

Frankental, an Orthodox Jew, speaks painfully of the hostility he has encountered from those who believe he is supporting the enemy. But since his son's murder, he has searched indefatigably for every opportunity to preach the value of peace to Israelis and Palestinians in order to prevent even more deaths. When challenged about the seemingly incongruous timing for a peace campaign, he responds that, paradoxically, the sheer scope of violence and cost to both communities over the last year may have opened a window for some small impact.

In the current, charged atmosphere of hatred, anger and distrust, many Israelis view the forum's campaign as naive at best – and even dangerous. They believe that by just talking with the enemy, Frankental and his associates weaken Israel's position in the necessary confrontation with the Palestinians. Moreover, they argue, as long as the Palestinian leadership is committed to violence, there is no point in flirting with hollow notions of mutual legitimization.

The forum's Palestinian partner is the National Movement for Change, a peace organization established several years ago in Gaza by Khader Mogarbe. A former member of the Palestine Liberation Front, Mogarbe served close to 20 years in Israeli prisons. In fluent Hebrew, he speaks of his changed convictions and his deep-seated belief that only talking can break down prejudices and bridge the gaps between the communities. Mogarbe's impact is minimal today, not just because of his message on the need for reconciliation with Israel as a Jewish state, but because he actively advocates against Muslim fundamentalism and for a more democratic, secular Palestinian society. However, as long as Palestinians continue to cast all the blame for their economic and political plight on the Israelis and refrain from openly challenging their own leadership, Mogarbe is likely to remain marginal.

Polls on its impact notwithstanding, it is folly to believe that activities such as the forum's campaign alone can influence Israeli public opinion when divorced from other factors. An additional wave of suicide bombs could quickly destroy any minimal impact the group has had in promoting the logic of negotiations. But even now, a majority of Israelis say that if they had confidence in the negotiations, they would be prepared for far-reaching concessions. As for the Palestinians, perhaps all that can be said is that the continued public activities of an organization like Mogarbe's reflect more diversity in that community than is generally acknowledged.

Florida, Canadian Jews and the U.S. connection

Many readers of this column have likely experienced at least part of a winter season in Florida. A fair number of retired Canadian Jews own or rent condos, staying for several months. Others (children and grandchildren) stay with relatives, or in hotels, for a week or two.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Parking lots in the malls or in the Century Village-type gated communities are full of Ontario and Quebec licence plates around the Christmas holidays. And a good proportion are seniors who own residences there.

While the east coast of South Florida no longer has a monopoly on American Jewish travel plans and condo purchases – some look to Florida's west coast, others to Arizona or California – there is still no escaping the Jewish ambience in parts of South Florida, from Miami up through Boca to Palm Beach.

Yet, the area is not static. This can be seen in its many gated retirement communities. My unscientific observations below are drawn from the large Century Village complex in Deerfield Beach, which I know best. They may or may not apply to the rest of South Florida.

I have noticed an ongoing change in the ethnic and religious mix. While the Jewish presence remains strong, there has been a steady inflow of non-Jews, including French Quebeckers, among condo owners and renters. There has been a steady increase in Christmas light decorations over the years, and more and more French can be heard at pools, tennis courts and golf courses. Since many Quebec Jews head south in part to escape the province's political and linguistic tensions, their reaction to this new influx is mixed, at best.

Most surprising is that there seem to be no black or American Latino residents in the complex. I have no idea how this segregation persists, unless middle-class visible minorities find such communities unappealing. Buyers and sellers are often connected by word of mouth, which can also restrict access to those outside the "in-group." This past Christmas, I noticed a Sikh fellow jogging around the village. I hope he was an owner and not just a visitor.

There has also been a major demographic shift. Many of the first wave of owners have died off, leaving the condos to their children, who are mainly middle aged and still working. These baby- boomers use their condos mainly at holiday periods. Over the next few years, many of them will retire. The age structure will become slightly younger, with a corresponding change in leisure-time activities and cultural ambience.

There is also a set of subtle class distinctions within South Florida's migratory Jewish population. The wealthy retire or settle in Palm Beach and Boca, often in luxury highrise condos or the more lavish gated communities. Middle class Jews gravitate to the more modest Century Village-type communities. This is similar to the social class distinctions they left in the northeast.

As the Jewish population as a whole ages, more Jews, including Canadians, are likely to spend more time down south. This will pose strains on Jewish family life, since grandparents, parents, and college-age children may all be spread out across the continent.

Actually, a winter vacation in Florida can help alleviate the stress of this dispersion as it brings families together between Rosh Hashanah and Passover. But the phenomenon will also weaken the ties of many Canadian Jews to Canada. Many retirees return to Canada largely to keep up medicare benefits and for medical treatments. But they often spend close to half the year down South.

At the other end of the age spectrum, more children and grandchildren of these retirees have begun to look southward. Certainly, more and more children of baby boomers are heading to the United States for undergraduate or graduate studies, as well as for work. This represents a Canadian Jewish brain drain.

The north-south pull has always been strong for Canadian Jews, who have tended to look to New York for communal connections. Canadian rabbis and Jewish communal leaders have been American or U.S.-trained. As the Jewish elderly, and their grandchildren, look south, the pull will become more formidable. The continental integration of Canadian Jews has long been underway. As the boomers age, and as their children seize opportunities in the United States, it will gain momentum.

The Kirshner File

Recife capitalizes on its Jewish history

Sixty or 70 years ago – no one in Recife is quite sure – a local Brazilian historian, Jose Antonio Goncalves de Mello, identified the site of Zur Israel (Rock of Israel), the first synagogue in the Americas.

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

Mello, an expert in Holland's 17th-century colonization of northeastern Brazil, stumbled upon it after combing through old documents and maps.

Zur Israel was completed in 1637, seven years after a Dutch force occupied the state of Pernambuco, sending the Portuguese colonists packing. During the short-lived Dutch era, which ended abruptly in 1654, Portuguese Jews who came to Brazil by way of Holland were permitted to practise their faith freely and openly in Recife. They established a functioning Jewish community, replete with schools, synagogues and a cemetery. In 1642, the first rabbi posted to the New World, Isaac Aboab da Fonseca, arrived from Amsterdam to take up his post at Zur Israel.

Apart from Jews, the port of Recife – a centre of sugar and tobacco production – was also inhabited by native Indians, Portuguese and New Christians, Jews whom the Inquisition had forced to convert to Christianity. It is estimated that Jews formed about 10 percent of Recife's population and almost half of its free, white inhabitants.

Conflicting street names.

After the Portuguese reconquest, the Jews were scattered. Some fled into the interior, others returned with the Dutch to Amsterdam and still others set sail for Dutch-held islands in the Caribbean Sea.

A group of 23 Jews, having been captured by Spanish pirates, were rescued by a French ship and deposited in New Amsterdam, a fledgling Dutch colony on the densely forested island of Manhattan, in what is now New York City. With the Dutch gone from Recife, Zur Israel was converted into a residence and private chapel of the Portuguese governor, who subsequently donated the building to a Catholic religious organization.

During the 19th century, following Brazil's independence from Portugal, Zur Israel was used as a French-style boutique. Then it was demolished and replaced by a bank and an electrical equipment shop.

After Mello's discovery, there was talk of excavating the site. But nothing was done until 1999, when an archeological team, led by Marcos Albuquerque of the Federal University of Pernambuco, began investigating. Albuquerque knew he had hit paydirt when he discovered a well. A commission of four rabbis from Brazil and Argentina confirmed that it was really a mikvah, or Jewish ritual bath.

During the course of the dig, Albuquerque also found Dutch and Portuguese bric-a-brac: fragments of smoking pipes and bits of clay enamelled dishes.

With the backing of the local and federal government, the Federacao Israelita de Pernambuco, the Safra Fund and the Inter American Bank, Recife decided to turn the site into a Jewish museum and a documentation and memorial centre. No attempt was made to reconstruct the synagogue. The original layout had been lost. Construction began last spring.

On Dec. 3, 2001, on a warm, sunny day in Recife, the Centro Cultural Judaico de Pernambuco, a pale yellow structure with white trim, was officially inaugurated at a press conference attended by local dignitaries and journalists. Among those at the ceremony were Boris Berenstein, president of the state Jewish federation; Tania Kaufman, an anthropologist and historian, and Jose Paulo Naslavsky, an archivist.

(Brazil's president, Fernando Henrique Cardoso, was scheduled to have opened the centre some months earlier, but dropped out, citing a "terrorist" threat. In fact, his cancellation stemmed from a nasty political turf war, reliable sources claim.)

Sinagoga Kahal Zur Israel, the centre's alternative name, is on a gentrified street that reflects the tumult of Recife's history. During the brief Dutch epoch, the street was called Rua Dos Judeus. Then, for centuries afterward, it was known as Rua Do Bom Jesus. Now, in honour of the opening of the Centro Cultural Judaico de Pernambuco, both names are being used. In stylized black letters, they are emblazoned on a building at the head of the street.

It is an attractive thoroughfare, dotted with 19th-century refurbished buildings, restaurants, cafes, nightclubs and boutiques. According to Kaufman, the campaign to breathe life into the Zur Israel project was galvanized by a desire to gentrify Recife's old quarter and thus enhance its tourist potential.

The focal point of the tastefully designed Centro Cultural Judaico de Pernambuco is Zur Israel's mikvah, the synagogue's last remaining remnant. Displayed beneath floor level, under heavy glass, it resembles nothing less than a spiffy ruin.

The walls are adorned with panels, in Portuguese and English, chronicling the Jewish presence in Recife. It seems that Zur Israel was not the sole shul in Recife. There was another synagogue, Congregation Magen Avraham, but its ruins have not been located.

The names of Zur Israel's original members are inscribed on plexiglass. I jotted down a few: Isaac Athyas, Abraham Ysrael Dias, Joseph Atias, Mose Peres, Joseph da Costa, David Burgos. Feminists and civil rights activists will note, rightly so, that only men are listed.

On the second floor, where the official inaugural took place, there is a space, with benches and a Torah ark, that could pass for a modern synagogue.

An Internet site, expected to be up and running soon, will offer a virtual tour of the centre. Its address will be: www.Arquivojudaicope.org.br.

By all accounts, Zur Israel has stirred at least a modicum of interest in Recife's Jewish past. This is all for the better, since Brazilian school texts attach little or no importance to the contributions of Jews to Brazil's colonial economy, said Naslavsky.

Katia Mesel, a Recife filmmaker, hopes to capitalize on this newfound interest. She plans to make a docudrama, titled The Rock and the Star, about Recife and its Jewish connection. Mesel, 53, has been working on it for six years, ever since she bought the rights to one of Mello's books, The Dutch in Brazil. She estimates the movie will cost about $3 million (US). Since she has yet to round up all the financing, she does not know when production will actually begin.

The Rock and the Star, which would be her first film on a Jewish topic, shifts between the present and the past. It begins as a young Jewish man examines his family tree, and unfolds in flashbacks in various locales: Brazil, Holland, Portugal and New York City.

The movie, which will be in Portuguese, Dutch, English and Hebrew, closes in 1654 with the arrival of Jews in New Amsterdam, the nucleus of today's American Jewish community.

An architect by training, Mesel can trace her lineage back to New Christians. Her mother, a descendant of Marranos, converted to Judaism when she was 19. She knows other Brazilians who've "returned" to Judaism from New Christian backgrounds. Among well-informed Jews, they are referred to as Anousim.

Recife's contemporary Jewish community, headed by Berenstein, a successful radiologist whose parents hail from Romania and Russia, consists of 450 families, 90 percent of whom are Ashkenazim.

Berenstein's father, a soldier in the Red Army during World War II, immigrated to Recife – a city of 1.5 million – to join his two brothers, who had settled in Brazil in the 1930s. "He arrived here with nothing," said Berenstein, the proprietor of four clinics who drives around in a Mercedes. "The first years were very hard." Like many Jews before and after him, he was a door-to-door pedlar. Having amassed savings, he opened a furniture store."My father's generation were mainly businessmen," he explained. "The sons and daughters are largely professionals."

Recife has one synagogue, Beit Menachem, which is affiliated with the Chabad movement. The vast majority of Jews here are inclined towards liberal Judaism, and generally avoid the Chabad shul.

Mesel and like-minded Jews attend services in Recife's Jewish day school, the Colegio Israelita Moyses Chvarts, which has 160 students, not all of them Jewish and some of mixed-race backgrounds.

It sits behind a high gray wall on a quiet, tree-lined street in Torre, a sedate neighbourhood several kilometres from Zur Israel. Founded 83 years ago, the colegio is the only Jewish day school in Pernambuco, which, outside Recife, has very few Jews.

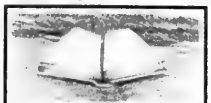
Experiencing God in our lives

By RABBI LORI MACKLIS

I still have very vivid memories of a day trip that my parents took with my brother and me when we were young. We went to a small town in Ontario; we had been reading a historical fiction of some of the events that had happened there in the previous century. It was a story that fed our imaginations from the page. When we arrived on the country roads where the incidents had happened, we could "hear" the horses riding. The sky cast a foreboding presence over the area and we re-experienced what it must have been like 100 years ago.



All teachers know the value of experience over the lecture or the written page. While it is true that experiences and lectures complement each other, until one is able to experience a setting, an action or experiment for oneself, it is hard to personalize it and find meaning in it.

An example of this idea can be found in Parshat Beshallach, in the Shirat Hayam. The Israelites had heard the stories of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but they now experienced God's power at the sea for themselves.

The song says, "This is my God and I will enshrine Him; The God of my father, and I will exalt Him." Until each person was able to experience God in his or her own life, they were not able to connect to the God of their ancestors.

Rabbi Mendel of Kotsk interprets this line as, "This is my God – I will have to find Him first and then I will enshrine Him." I understand this line to mean, if I personally am not actively looking to experience God in my life, not just in the life of my people, then I will not be able to make a dwelling place for God within me.

Even all of the marvels and miracles that the Israelites experienced at sea and in the desert were not enough to keep the people from grumbling and complaining every step of the way. How much more is it difficult for us to "find" and experience God in our daily lives!

So the written word and the experience must complement each other. When we rise to say the Amidah, we first must remember the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob, the God of Sarah, the God of Rebecca, the God of Leah and the God of Rachel. Each of these patriarchs and matriarchs had a unique experience of God in his or her life. This is the God we can connect with – the God of our people, the God of our community – but we must also experience God individually. When I experience God as the One who gives me strength to cope with the world; when I experience God as the One who provides a direction for my life, then I will be able to praise God.

May each of us find moments in our lives when we are able to say, "This is my God and I will sing God's praises."

Rabbi Macklis is the assistant rabbi at Temple Sinai and a member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

The diligent almond tree

By BATSHEVA POMERANTZ
Israel Press Service

Guest Voice

As spring approaches, the mountainous Israeli landscape awakens after three months of winter rains. Almond trees are the first to shower generous bouquets of white and pink blossoms from their boughs; dotting the slopes of Israel's mountains and plains.

The almond tree has become the symbol of Tu b'Shvat, the 15th day of the Hebrew month Shvat, also known as the New Year of the Trees, due to its early and abundant blossom.

Hebrew language reflects the quality of the almond, as the word for "diligence" in Hebrew is shkidah, derived from shaked (almond), and, likewise, "persevered" is shakad.

In fact, both diligence and perseverance were needed to cultivate the almond tree in the late 19th century after Baron Edmond de Rothschild recommended planting it in addition to vineyards to bolster the economy. High quality almond species were introduced, but it soon became evident that citrus orchards were more profitable.

After the founding of the State of Israel, more groves were planted, mainly in the Upper Galilee and the northern Negev, with the mass planting of almond trees, using mechanized methods, being introduced in the 1970s.

The almond was considered a superior fruit even as far back as biblical times. Jacob's sons were ordered by their father to include almonds in the offerings they were taking to Joseph in Egypt in order to win favour in their powerful brother's eyes (Genesis 43:11).

The almond blossom played a significant role during a revolt by the Children of Israel against Moses and Aaron's leadership. The leaders of the twelve tribes, including Aaron who represented the tribe of Levi, agreed that whoever's staff blossomed overnight would be elected leader. Not only was Aaron's staff the only one to blossom overnight, but it then immediately produced its fruit, the almond. This was quite remarkable considering that the almond tree's fruit usually appears about five months after its flowers.

Yehuda Feliks, an Israeli professor of botany, writes in his book, Plant World of the Bible, that the almond, known in Latin as prunus amygdalus, is related to stone fruits such as peaches, apricots, cherries and prunes.

Two types of uncultivated almond trees are found in Israel: the sweet almond, which has white and pink flowers, and the bitter almond, which has only white flowers.

The fruit of uncultivated almond trees consists of the bitter substance amygdaline. Cultivated sweet species, made by grafting, result in a thin shell and a large sweet seed.

Almonds were a treat for children in talmudic times, along with nuts, peaches and pomegranates, while their shells were utilized for heating. The almond fruit actually consists of three layers of shell and skin, including a tough gray-green hull, which splits open at maturity to reveal the almond shell, which encloses the nut.

It has been noted that the branches of the almond tree in full bloom appear, from various angles, to resemble the branches of the menorah, Israel's national symbol, radiating light with their fusion of pink and white petals.

In his book Nature and Landscapes in Israel's Heritage, Nogah HaReuveni, founder of Neot Kedumim, the biblical landscape reserve in central Israel, finds another connection between the almond and the menorah: In the biblical description of the menorah, its cups are described as "mishukadim" (from shaked – almond). Commentators note that mishukadim can mean decorated with specks, as the wooden shell of the almond, or almond-shaped cups. The almond, upon ripening into fruit, indeed resembles the cups of the menorah.

A large menorah faces the Knesset, Israel's parliament, which marks its birthday on Tu b'Shvat. The Knesset convened its first session in the Jewish Agency building in 1949 on this day. [In 1950, the Knesset moved to the building that now houses Israel's Ministry of Tourism, moving to its current location in 1966.]

Today, the nutritious almond, popular with vegetarians, is made into pastes, drinks and sweets, such as marzipan. In fact, the Kfar Tavor visitors' centre in northern Israel contains an unusual sight – a marzipan museum that includes a showroom with imaginative and elegant marzipan creations, and an area where children can make marzipan items. The marzipan, it should be noted, is imported from the almond groves of California, which now provide most of the almonds used to make local marzipan.

As we approach Tu b'Shvat, Israelis stock up on almonds and other treats, while the popular children's song, Hash'kediyah Porachat – "The Blossoming Almond Tree," can be heard emanating from schools and kindergartens all over Israel. Almond trees in full bloom herald the spring, like a long-awaited guest, extolling the beauty of the land of Israel:

The almond tree
The almond tree is growing.
A golden sun is glowing.
Birds sing out from tree to tree.
And this is what they say to me.

Tu b'Shvat is coming
The birthday of the trees. (x2)

Hash'kediyah porachat
Hash'kediyah porachat,
V'shemesh paz zorachat,
Tziporim meirosh kol gag,
Mevasrot et bo hachag.

Tu Bishvat higiya
Chag la'ilanot.

Bar/bat mitzvah – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I continue my look at bar and bat mitzvah Internet sites with some advice for the b'nai mitzvah and their families.

One of the central (and most nerve-wracking) events of coming of age is being called up to read from the Torah. Of course, Web sites will never replace human teachers, but there are several places you can visit and commercial software that you buy to learn how to chant from the Torah [http://hebrew.about.com/cs/barbatmitzvah/]. My favourite Web site is "Navigating the Bible" where every verse of the Torah can be viewed in Hebrew, Hebrew transliterated into English and English [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd4.asp]. In addition, each Hebrew verse appears both the way it appears on the Torah scrolls and in the Chumash with "nekudot" (vowels) and "trope" (musical notation). And last but not least, if you want to hear the verse being sung, simply click on the speaker icon and you'll hear Cantor Moshe Haschel perform it.

Although becoming a bat or bar mitzvah is seen as a stepping stone toward adulthood, Judith Davis, a licensed family therapist, suggests that it is actually a milestone for the entire family. The parents' relationship is maturing and they will have to find new ways to deal with their child's transition into adolescence. At the same time, there may be new challenges in dealing with their own aging parents [http://www.jflmail.com/oldarticles/1461.html]. In a related article, Davis also suggests this is an opportunity for family healing:

"Our decision to invite Aunt Rosie, who's been cut off from the family since Uncle Ben died, could begin healing wounds throughout that generation, many of which we aren't even aware of. Our decisions about everything, from prayers to parties, guest lists to thank-you notes, are really decisions about relationships. They are the therapeutic opportunities hidden in the ritual's details, the 'work' that occurs as we outgrow old roles and take on new ones" [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1764.html].

I particularly liked an article entitled "Planning a special bar/bat mitzvah" that deals with the increasing numbers of Jewish b'nai mitzvah with disabilities preparing for their celebrations. We learn about Joel Hornstein who recited his portion from the Torah in Hebrew and English, something that had not been expected of a child with autism. The article suggests that special co-operation is required between the parents, rabbi, cantor, religious school teacher, and if possible, the disabled child: "They should consider themselves a team with one goal in mind: The development of a beautiful and meaningful ceremony that recognizes the disabled person as a member of the Jewish community and as an affirmation of Jewish life that transcends all the usual boundaries" [http://www.jewishjournal.com/archive/08.11.00/specialmitzvah.08.11.00.html].

Another situation that requires special planning is when there is a divorce in the family. Some tips for divorced couples:

- Recognize that the simchah belongs to your child;
- Never use your child as a confidante for your feelings of sadness or anger;
- Be a mensch (kind and generous person) and behave in a way that reflects the traits you want your son or daughter to emulate [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/2591.html].

And for some personal insights, Evelyn Luchs explains the difficulties she faced as a single mother of a bar mitzvah and how she overcame them [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/972.html].

There many other questions you may have about preparing for your simchah. And there's a good chance they've already been asked and answered at the marvelous Jewish.com Web site. For example, in response to a question about bar mitzvah jitters, the following advice is offered:

- Work hard and be well prepared;
- Don't tell your friends that you are anxious; and
- "Remember that everyone there is on your side. The adults are going to be there because they love you, and the kids will all fall into two groups: those thinking, 'Thank Heaven it isn't my turn yet,' and those thinking, 'Thank Heaven mine is over'" [http://www.jewish.com/askarabbi/Lifecycle_Events/Bar_and_Bat-Mitzvah/].

Knowledge from the trees

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As Tu b'Shvat nears, we expand our view from the day to day and spend a moment thinking of the other creations that share our world.

The new year for the trees is a time to reflect on what we can learn from the trees that can affect our lives. Certainly we are taught in the Torah how we must behave toward the trees. We are forbidden to cut down a tree if it bears fruit. We are forbidden to level a forest of trees in order to besiege a city in wartime. We are particular about how and when we harvest fruit. The list goes on from there.

There is of course a practical side to our preservation of the trees, as they are intrinsic to our survival – they give us food to eat and air to breathe. But Jewish texts take us beyond the mundane and the practical, and there is much to learn from the trees.

Firstly, we are to respect all of creation, including the trees. One of the most famous trees in our texts appears in Genesis: the tree of knowledge of good and evil. This is the tree whose fruit (and our eating of it) caused events to unfold which resulted in our expulsion from the Garden of Eden. Yet we do not know which tree it was, as it remains unnamed.

The midrash in Genesis Rabbah contains a discussion wherein the rabbis speculate about which tree is the tree of knowledge. The conclusion is that its identity is intentionally hidden from us – we are never to know.

The reason for its anonymity lies in the reality of the human condition. According to the rabbis, if we knew the identity of the tree, we would forever be pointing to it and accusing it of causing our downfall. We would view it as a sinful tree, a tree of evil, and by extension, the knowledge we had gained would be considered sinful and evil. To protect the honour of the tree, a part of creation, we are kept in the dark.

In other words, sometimes certain knowledge is kept from us so that other knowledge can come to light. We do not learn the name of the tree, but we learn the more important lesson of respecting and honouring all of creation.

Another important lesson comes from a midrash in which a scholar who has been wandering for a long time sees a tree in the distance. By walking toward the tree and finally reaching it, the scholar ultimately finds a village of people and is provided with shelter. He returns to the tree and offers it a blessing but cannot decide with what to bless the tree. It is already growing strongly and, therefore, clearly has a water source. Its branches are long and powerful and there seems nothing left wanting.

The scholar finally understands that the only blessing to be offered to the tree is that its fruit should grow with the strength and power that it now possesses. It is the hope of future fulfillment and the blessing of children and continuity. For that instant, the vast differences between all the species of creation seem very small indeed.

Professor dedicated to things running smoothly

German submarines roaming Atlantic sea routes were sinking United States merchant marine ships at will and at an alarming rate.

The problem, which was growing worse by the week, had to be urgently addressed so that food and military supplies could be shipped to allies like Britain and the Soviet Union in the face of Nazi Germany's blockade.

Mathematicians, physicists and statisticians were called in to find a practical solution. Building mathematical models, they devised an all but foolproof method of bombing Germany's increasingly dangerous submarine fleet.

These innovative scientists made a key contribution to the war effort.

Sixty years on, operation researchers are still applying their knowledge to solve military problems, particularly in militarily-engaged countries like the United States and Israel.

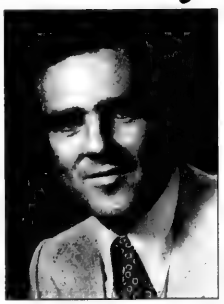
"Operations research is very advanced in Israel, especially in the army," said Berman, a University of Toronto professor.

(By no coincidence, Ehud Barak, Israel's former prime minister and chief of staff, has a degree in operations research).

Today, however, operations research is also being brought to bear in civilian situations.

Commercial airlines use its techniques to plan flight schedules and crew assignments.

Post offices, police forces, fire stations, manufacturing plants and the like rely on its methodology to solve managerial, logistics, transportation and inventory problems.



Oded Berman

Calculating probabilities, as Berman suggests, is no easy task.

"The number of possible solutions may be in the millions," said Berman, a former associate dean of programs at the U of T's Joseph L. Rotman School of Management.

"It's actually quite complicated," he added. "There is a lot of mathematics behind it."

Berman, a seventh-generation Israeli, holds degrees from Tel Aviv University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT).

As an undergraduate student, fresh from serving in the Israeli army, he studied economics and statistics. Later, at the PhD level, he specialized in operations research.

Berman, whose scholarly interests range from operations management to software reliability, has been associated with the University of Toronto since 1990.

Before arriving in Toronto, he taught at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the University of Calgary and the University of Massachusetts, where he was chair of the management sciences department.

Berman, 54, came here partly because he likes Canada's social welfare system. "I feel better in a place that takes care of the poor and the weak," he explained.

And apart from being attracted to Toronto's cosmopolitan atmosphere, he could not resist an offer from a great university.

He was born in Jerusalem a year before the first Arab-Israeli war. His late father, Moshe, was chief engineer of Israel's telecommunications network. His mother, Cila, was a homemaker.

Berman has two sisters. Michal teaches computer science in the United States. Liora is a civil servant in Israel.

Prior to becoming an academic, Berman was an athlete, Israel's 800-metre youth champion. After completing his army service in 1969, he decided to concentrate on his studies. "It was time to grow up," he said. "But I still love sports."

He has been through two wars: the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

In 1974, he left Israel to continue his education at MIT, figuring, correctly as it happened, that a PhD from MIT would help his career. In 1978, he launched his academic career in MIT's department of electrical engineering.

In the past 24 years, he has published more than 120 articles, contributed monographs to several books and co-written (with Niv Ahituv, currently vice-president of Tel Aviv University) a book entitled Operations Management of Distributed Service Networks – A Practical Quantitative Approach.

To this day, Berman maintains close professional and personal ties with Israel. He visits at least once a year and is writing a book with a Haifa University colleague.

A year ago, he was a keynote speaker at a seminar in Eilat. In 1984-85, he was a visiting professor at the Technion and Tel Aviv University.

Despite his ties to Israel, he has no foreseeable plans to leave Canada. "You never say never. Who knows? But not in the very near future."

Berman's wife, Nili, an Israeli, teaches at Bialik. They have three sons: Guy, 27, a lawyer; Ron, 21, a University of Toronto student who plays for Israel's national hockey team, and Danny, 10, a grade 5 student at Associated Hebrew School.

The recipient of the Rotman school's Roger Martin and Nancy Lang Award for Research Excellence in 2000, Berman spends several days a month as a consultant.

One of his clients is the Toronto Police Service, which asked him to devise a fast response time model.

Berman's work on behalf of another client, the U.S. Post Office, focused on staffing levels. Thanks to a mathematical model he and others developed, the post office now saves about $1 billion (US) a year.

HIPPY helps poor kids succeed in school

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For some people, the term hippie conjures up images of long hair, bell-bottom jeans and a rejection of conventional values.

But for those involved in the Home Instruction for Parents of Preschool Youngsters – HIPPY for short – the term means success for economically deprived immigrant and minority families.

The program, initiated by Avima Lombard in Israel in 1969, helps parents become the first educators of their own children. Parents – usually mothers at home – are trained by tutors from their own community to teach preschoolers the skills they need to begin primary school on par with their non-immigrant peers.

Not only is the child's success in school enhanced because they are better prepared, said Henry Green, chair of the HIPPY board of trustees, "but over the years we've seen that by educating parents to deliver curriculum, a structure has developed which has helped [parents] move on to careers.

"Parents often go on to become tutors themselves and then go back and finish high school, community college or university. Many have become teachers," said Green, who is currently a visiting fellow at the University of Toronto.

HIPPY has "allowed the parent to move out of poverty, off of welfare and into educational tracts."

U.S. Senator Hilary Clinton was so impressed with the Israeli program that she championed it throughout the United States while her husband was president, Green said.

The strength of the program lies in its ability to empower parents to become the first teachers of their children

HIPPY has grown in the United States from one pilot helping a handful of families to 150 sites in over 30 states helping tens of thousands of children.

Carol Slater, chair of HIPPY Canada, said that Israel began international workshops exporting its national preschool program to other countries in 1982 through its Centre for Creative Learning at Hebrew University. The international organization now operates in more than eight countries – including Turkey and South Africa.

Five years ago, when Slater was vice-president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, she came across a HIPPY pamphlet and began work on opening the first Canadian site.

Working together with Debby Bell from Simon Fraser University and Enzo Guirrieio from the Britannia Community Services Centre in Vancouver and with funding from various public and private sources including Health Canada, United Way and the Diamond Foundation, a program was launched in Vancouver three years ago. A second site is about to be opened in Halifax.

The strength of the program lies in its ability to "empower parents to become the first teachers of their children," Slater said. This gives status to the parent in the eyes of the child, thereby building self-esteem in both.

Monthly meetings bring immigrants together to discuss problems and accomplishments which "goes a long way in helping these parents overcome their fear of going into places like schools and dealing with authority for the benefit of their children," Slater said.

Bringing the program into the homes of the families eliminates the need for a drop-in centre, which significantly reduces the costs associated with the program, she added.

Green is working towards opening a Toronto site by September. The benefits of this program lie not only in its ability to build success within economically disadvantaged homes, he said, but because of its connection to Israel, it also creates interethnic and interreligious connections for the future.

By involving Israel in the educational process, positive partnerships are created between many diverse groups, he said, adding that HIPPY provides a link to Israel for people – such as the Somali or Aboriginal communities – who likely would have little other relationship with the Jewish community.

Ryerson deals with anti-Semitic and hate graffiti

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent appearance of anti-Semitic and homophobic graffiti in men's washrooms at Ryerson University appears to be an isolated, but serious incident, according to Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC). The Toronto police hate crime unit and 52 division have been brought into the case.

Although offensive graffiti is not uncommon in washrooms, the recent spate at South Kerr Hall is different, Farber told The CJN. "It's in violation of hate laws and is also advocating genocide. [That] raises the level of the criminal violation."

Among the graffiti were comments including "Die Jews," "Islam will take over Canada" and "Support Israel's existence if you want to die."

Also, Farber added, a Jewish student was named in a separate piece of graffiti. "That's very disconcerting," he said. "To the best of my recollection, this is the first time we've seen a name attached to anti-Semitic graffiti."

Jews and gays are the two groups most often targeted in hate crimes and hate graffiti, he noted. "It's offensive to everybody who has some decency in them."

The only other anti-Semitic incident in recent memory on the downtown Toronto campus is the defacement of Ryerson's Jewish Students Association's sukkah over a year ago, with the words "Hay Israel, How many kids U kill?"

Following the recent incident, JSA president Brian Wolk said he got a letter of support last week from a Muslim student affiliated with the university's Muslim student association.

Wolk was disgusted by the graffiti, but said he doubts that it would discourage Jewish students from choosing the school. He feels comfortable among the multicultural student body, and said that people generally choose Ryerson for the programs it offers.

There was talk last week at the JSA of running educational anti-racism seminars in conjunction with other campus groups such as ryePRIDE, the university's gay student group, but nothing had been initiated yet, he said.

Michelle Lackie, the JSA's staff liaison at Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto – and the staffer for Jewish Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender (JLGBT) students and young professionals of Toronto – commended Ryerson's Discrimination and Harassment Prevention Services office for its response to the graffiti, which included posting of fliers warning that graffiti motivated by bias, prejudice or hate could be considered a hate crime and that perpetrators would be disciplined.

The fliers state in bold letters, "Hate has no place at Ryerson."

Detective James Hogan of the Toronto police hate crimes unit said he would guess the graffiti is the work of "people who use the building frequently – Ryerson students." He said his unit receives "occasional calls" from other universities about similar incidents.

Drache may be the only openly gay Jewish student at Ryerson; he does not know of any others

Ryerson student Mordecai Drache, 29, who discovered the graffiti in the early evening of Jan. 8, was "really upset… It was sort of the two extremes of vulnerability and seething anger." Drache may be the only openly gay Jewish student at Ryerson; he does not know of any others.

He did not report his discovery to the Ryerson student council (ryeSAC) until two days later, because he had a personal matter to deal with on the intervening day, he told The CJN. RyeSAC contacted the university's harassment office, he said.

Drache said there is homophobic graffiti "all the time" in the men's washrooms, and he has also seen anti-Islamic graffiti, but the recent graffiti was particularly prominent. Not only did it target two groups and name a Jewish student, but it "seemed very vicious," he said.

Farber would advise students to be vigilant, and to report such graffiti to Ryerson authorities and to CJC

Bar-Ilan Friends plan conference on terrorism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University will hold its first BESA Center conference Sunday, Jan. 27 at Leah Posluns Theatre.

The conference – a three-hour program entitled How Can We Be Secure from Terrorism? – will feature 15-minute talks by BESA faculty members Efraim Inbar and Gerald Steinberg, as well as Irwin Cotler, human rights lawyer and MP for Mount Royal.

The talks will be followed by breakout sessions, providing an opportunity for interaction with the speakers.

Inbar, director of Bar-Ilan's BESA Center – known more formally as the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies – will speak on the need to support the United States in the global campaign against terror and what should be done by Canada and other democratic countries to fight terror.

Steinberg, a senior research associate and professor of political studies, will give a talk called Responding To the Myth of "Good Terror," and Cotler, who is a member of the BESA Center Advisory Board, will give an address called Durban to Ground Zero: What Have We Learned?

The BESA Center, which is affiliated with the university's political studies department, focuses on the study of Middle East peace and security.

Part of its mission is to educate the community on issues affecting Israel and the Jewish world, said Dov Altman, executive director of the Canadian Friends organization. The conference, for which planning began shortly after Sept. 11, is "one of the ways we are working with the community to fill that role."

Altman said he believes it was visionary of Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, and founder of the centre a decade ago, to dedicate the centre to the late Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin and, particularly, to his Egyptian counterpart Anwar Sadat for their groundbreaking peace initiatives.

The conference will begin at 7:00 p.m. (refreshments at 6:30). Admission is free.

Advocate for Israel tours Ramallah following conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mark Eltis was likely the only Jewish visitor the day he toured Ramallah earlier this month.

The University of Waterloo student and former Jewish Students' Association president, who has spoken about Israel at a number of Ontario campuses in the past year, felt apprehensive on beginning his journey to the Palestinian Authority (PA), he admitted. Before leaving his Jerusalem hotel, he removed his Star of David, not knowing whom he might encounter.

UWO student Mark Eltis toured Ramallah in a Canadian government SUV.

"The first thought that comes to mind going into Ramallah, is the scene of those two soldiers being brutally lynched by the mob," he said in a recent phone interview.

His impromptu, 90-minute tour of Ramallah took place after Eltis participated as one of about 30 Canadian delegates in the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) conference at the end of December. The event, held at Neve Ilan on the outskirts of Jerusalem, featured sessions on activism, leadership and Israel in the media.

During a leadership seminar after the conference, Eltis spoke with WUJS conference speaker Steve Hibbard, the Canadian government representative to the PA, following Hibbard's talk to students at the Israeli foreign ministry office.

Hibbard told Eltis to give him a call if he ever wanted to see Ramallah. On the final day of his trip, Eltis took the diplomat up on his offer, motivated in part by his own advocacy work. "The next time I'm in a debate, I want to say, 'I've been there,'" he told The CJN.

Hibbard sent a bullet-proof car with diplomatic licence plates to pick Eltis up at his hotel. His first stop – after a 30-minute delay at the border checkpoint – was Hibbard's office. The security was beyond anything Eltis had ever seen. "The actual structure [appeared to be] made to withstand... a rioting mob," he said.

Eltis saw local refugee camps, some out-of-the-way Israeli tanks, the office for the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's compound, but he also saw "mansions that are bigger than any house I could ever afford." He was told they belonged to American expatriates of Palestinian descent.

"Sure, there's suffering," he said, but if Ramallah citizens are living in a "horrific police state," he didn't see it. People were out shopping and going about their business.

"The funny thing was, you couldn't really tell Ramallah apart from a suburb in Jerusalem... It's a real shame when [media] show the entire Palestinian population as a bunch of starving, desperate refugees. Most of Ramallah is fairly middle class."

His Palestinian guide "continually expressed his desire for peace," Eltis said. "He didn't say anything too controversial. The irony was that his stances were much more moderate than Palestinian spokespeople you see on television or hear in Canada."

He noted that the guide was somewhat vague about the meaning of the words on public posters of suicide bombers. He suspects that both the guide and driver knew he was Jewish, partly because they called Israel by its proper name.

Eltis said he asked whether Palestinians are aware of what their leadership rejected at Camp David. His guide's answer was that they don't, Eltis reported.

"I haven't changed my political views," said Eltis, who describes himself as centre to centre-right politically. But he "[couldn't] say one bad thing" about the two Palestinians who showed him around Ramallah. "My hosts were very gracious. They treated me with the utmost respect.

"It was nice to speak to some Palestinians and get their point of view. In the end, I think we're all prisoners of the political situation. It's unfortunate. There are good people on both sides."

As it turned out, Eltis was more concerned for his safety in the old quarter of Jerusalem, where the thought of suicide bombers crossed his mind, than he was in Ramallah, from the safety of a bulletproof, Canadian car.

He is convinced that Israel needs support from Diaspora Jewry, in the form of visits. He compared love for Israel to love for a person: If you love someone, you don't wait for a better time, he said. "You go when they need you."

Ironically, he felt that the Canadians at the WUJS conference needed their Israeli counterparts' solidarity more than the Israelis needed Canadian support. When a Palestinian speaker equated Zionism with terrorism, the Israelis reacted with much greater equanimity than the Canadians, Eltis said. "It was obvious that we were the ones who were insecure."

A Phenomenal Story of Faith, Courage and Unity!

Rebbitzin Rivka Schevischurder-Moore, Aunt to the five surviving orphans has toured the world sharing a moving tribute to her beloved brother Mati, his wife and three children who were victims of the Sbarro pizza shop bombing in August.

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

Figs play important role in traditional Tu b'Shvat treats

BY RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat means simply the 15th day of the Hebrew month Shvat, which this year falls on Jan. 28. The Israeli folk song, The almond trees are blooming, invariably proves to be true, for sure enough, the almond trees in the Jerusalem Forest near my home become a riot of white-pink blossoms every year around Tu b'Shvat time.

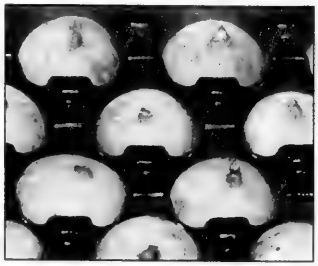
On Tu b'Shvat, it is the custom to eat the fruits for which the Torah praises the Land of Israel, as mentioned in the verse referring to the Land as a good land, "a land of wheat, barley, grape, fig and pomegranate, a land of olives and date honey" (Deuteronomy 8:8). Together with the other species, figs are mentioned in the Torah 16 times, as the most important of the country's fruit.

Figs were cultivated in Israel in very early times. The fig was a basic food, possessing high nutritional value, largely by virtue of its honey. The fig tree is the first mentioned by name in the Torah: Adam and Eve covered themselves with fig leaves after they ate of the fruit of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. The fig is also mentioned as having medicinal qualities. Figs were dried in the sun and were either left whole or cut up and pressed.

More than 70 expressions connected with the fig can be found in mishnaic and talmudic literature. Various strains are mentioned, depending on the colour and time of ripening. Today, fig trees are cultivated in Israel mainly by Arabs.

Their economic value is limited in modern Jewish agriculture because the fruit must be picked almost daily since it does not ripen simultaneously. Perhaps this is why most figs eaten in Israel today are dried and imported from Turkey. In North America, they are mostly grown in California. Large, shady fig trees can be found in Israel, especially on the banks of streams and near springs, and are among the most beautiful trees in the country.

Figs are as important a food to modern man as they were to our predecessors in Eretz Yisrael. Nutrient-dense, tasty, portable and versatile, they help meet the needs of today's dietary guidelines. Dried figs make satisfying snacks and sweet and flavourful recipe additions. The dense, sweet flesh, coupled with the unique crunchy seed, goes well in baked goods, and with meat, poultry, fish, vegetables and other fruits. Figs can act as a sweetener in a variety of preparations. Fig puree (8 oz. of figs pureed in a blender with 1/4 to 1/3 cup water or fruit juice) can be used as both a sweetener and a fat substitute in many recipes.



White figs by the crate

One serving of figs is 40 grams, about 1/4 cup or about 4 or 5 figs. They contain more dietary fibre per serving than any other common dried or fresh fruit, as well as the highest overall mineral content of all common fruits.

The 40-gram serving is an easy way to add a serving of fruit to reach the daily recommendation of a minimum of five fruits and vegetables.

Enjoy dried figs year round with a myriad of possibilities! Add sliced figs to rice, couscous, wheat or barley kernels as they cook; sprinkle with sauteed onion. Toss into pancake mix. Stir dried figs into any drop or bar cookie. Stuff apples with chopped, dried figs. Quickly prepare some impressive and delicious tarts for an afternoon tea: spoon prepared pudding into ready-made tart shells; top with a few fig slices and sprinkle with lemon zest.

SPICED FIG COMPOTE

Try this compote year-round as well as for Tu b'Shvat.

1 lb. figs, checked
2 cups sweet red wine
1/4 cup firmly packed brown sugar
4-in. stick cinnamon
4 cloves
shredded zest of 1 lemon
shredded zest of 1 orange

Combine figs with wine in medium saucepan. Add brown sugar, cinnamon, cloves and shredded citrus zest. Bring to a boil, partially cover, reduce heat and simmer 45 minutes to one hour, until figs are plump and soft.

Remove from heat and let stand, partially covered, several hours or until cool. Transfer to a bowl and refrigerate, covered, two hours or longer.

Divide figs among dessert bowls and garnish with additional shredded orange zest. Yield: 6 servings.

CHOCOLATE CHIP FIG BARS

A treat to satisfy the sweetest tooth, these delicious goodies are appropriate anytime.

1 3/4 cups all-purpose flour, sifted
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
3/4 cup firmly packed brown sugar
1/2 cup unsalted margarine, softened
1 egg, slightly beaten
grated peel of 1 orange (about 1 tsp.)
1 tsp. vanilla
1 1/4 cups chocolate chips (divided)
1/2 cup chopped dried figs

Stir flour, baking powder, soda, salt and cinnamon together. Cream brown sugar and margarine in a large bowl. Add egg, orange peel and vanilla, beating well. Gradually stir in flour mixture. Stir in one cup chocolate chips and chopped figs. Chill dough 15 to 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 375. Divide dough into thirds. With lightly floured hands, form each third into 12-inch log. Place on large (17 x 14-inch) greased cookie sheet 3 inches apart.

Flatten each log to about 2 inches wide and 1/2 inch thick. Bake for 15 to 20 minutes or until lightly brown. Loosen from pan and cool slightly. Cut diagonally into about 1-inch slices. Melt remaining 1/4 cup chocolate chips over hot water. Drizzle chocolate over bars. Cool until chocolate sets (or chill briefly in refrigerator) and slice with a sharp knife. Yield: about 3 dozen cookies.

FRESH FIG BARS

If you are lucky enough, as we are, to have a fig tree in your yard, save this recipe for July-August, when they ripen.

4 cups fresh figs, checked and chopped
1 cup water
1 cup honey
1/4 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. grated lemon peel
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour, sifted
2 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup unsalted margarine, softened
3/4 cup firmly packed brown sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour, sifted
1/2 tsp. salt
3 cups quick-cooking oatmeal

Combine figs, water, honey, 1/4 tsp. salt and lemon peel in saucepan and simmer 1 to 1 hours or until dark and thickened, stirring occasionally. Combine 2 tbsp. flour and water and stir into fig mixture.

Cook 5 minutes longer, stirring constantly. Remove from heat and stir in lemon juice. Cream margarine with brown sugar until light and fluffy. Combine flour, 1/2 tsp. salt and oatmeal and stir into creamed mixture.

Preheat oven to 350. Pat half of oatmeal mixture into bottom of a well-greased 9 x 13-inch pan. Spread fig filling evenly over oatmeal mixture. Sprinkle remaining half of oatmeal mixture on top and press with fork.

Bake for 25-30 minutes or until lightly browned around the edges. Cut into squares while still warm. Cool completely before removing from pan. Yield: 24 bars.

CJ Food

Some tasty suggestions for celebrating Tu b'Shvat

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat was chosen because of its timely position between the winter rains in Israel when the trees are dormant and the period when the tree sap begins to rise in the spring. Fruit ripening before Tu b'Shvat is considered of the old year; fruit ripening afterward is from the new year.

On the holiday, there should be four different kinds of wine served, as well as at least three different kinds of fruit and nuts. The precise number of fruits and nuts can vary widely depending on your own particular minhag (custom).

The first cup of wine should be a dry white wine representing the dormant winter. The second cup should be pale (a pale rose or a mixture of red and white wine) representing the beginnings of spring. The third cup should be more deeply coloured but not a deep red. This cup symbolizes blooming trees. The fourth and final cup of wine should be a deep red colour to represent trees with ripe fruit.

The first fruit eaten should have an inedible covering (symbolizing the soul within man). The second fruit should be one that is edible except for a pit (symbolizing the heart of man). The third fruit is one in which the whole fruit can be eaten. This fruit is said to symbolize creation.

Some suggested fruits are bananas, avocados, melons, nectarines, apricots, peaches, blueberries, strawberries, grapes, olives, dates, figs, pomegranates, oranges, apples, walnuts, almonds, carobs, pears and cherries. If you have difficulty finding them, use the closest available substitute. For example, use grape jam or raisins for fresh grapes, canned cherries or cherry jam for cherries, and fig bar cookies for figs. You should also try and include two baked foods containing wheat.

OATMEAL RAISIN MUFFINS
(dairy)

1 cup crushed pineapple, undrained
1 cup sour cream
1 egg
¼ cup butter, melted
1½ cups flour
1 cup old-fashioned oats or quick oats
½ cup sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
1 cup raisins

Preheat oven to 350. In a small bowl, combine the undrained pineapple, sour cream, egg and butter. Mix until blended. In a large bowl combine the flour, oats, sugar, salt, baking powder, cinnamon and raisins. Make a well in the centre of the dry mixture. Pour in the pineapple mixture and stir until just mixed. Spoon the batter into greased 2½-inch muffin cups. Bake for 30 to 35 minutes until lightly browned and a wooden toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Serve warm. Makes 12.

PISTACHIO STUFFED MUSHROOMS
(dairy or pareve)

20 large mushroom caps
½ cup onion, minced
½ cup butter or margarine, divided
⅓ to ½ cup dry bread crumbs
½ cup chopped pistachios or pecans
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
¼ tsp. marjoram, crushed
¼ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. Remove stems from mushroom caps and finely chop the stems. Saute the stems and onion in ¼ cup butter until tender. Place the mixture in a bowl to cool for 10 minutes. Add the bread crumbs, pistachios or pecans, parsley, marjoram and salt. Mix well. Spoon stuffing into mushroom caps.

Place the stuffed caps on baking sheet and drizzle the tops with the remaining melted butter. Bake 5 minutes or until hot. Makes 20 appetizers.

The stuffed mushrooms can be broiled instead of baked. Broil 6 inches from heat for 5 minutes until browned and thoroughly heated.

FRUIT AND RICE SALAD WITH HONEY DIJON VINAIGRETTE

4 cups cooked brown or wild rice, chilled
¼ cup raisins or dried cherries
½ cup chopped dried apricots
½ cup chopped pecans, toasted
¼ cup green onions, sliced thin
½ cup sliced water chestnuts
3 avocados
vinaigrette (see recipe below)

Place the raisins and apricots in small bowl and cover them with boiling water. Let them stand for 10 minutes then drain, discarding the liquid, and let them cool.

Add the pecans, green onions, water chestnuts, and raisins and apricots to the chilled rice. Mix well and then pour the vinaigrette over the mixture. Toss until the mixture is coated with the vinaigrette and then refrigerate for 1 hour. Just before serving, halve, seed and peel the avocados. Fill each half with the rice salad and serve. Serves 6. You can decorate the salad with a few pecan halves and green onion slices

Vinaigrette:
¼ cup oil
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. honey
¼ tsp. ground coriander
¼ tsp. Dijon-style mustard salt and pepper to taste

Shake all ingredients together in a tightly covered container.

Cantorial Soloist / Music Director For Hamilton Synagogue

A vibrant 150-year old Reform synagogue that honours tradition, but also seeks innovation, is looking for a part time cantorial soloist. We are looking for someone with a talent for engaging and involving the community in prayer. Interest in choir development, organizational skills and ability to play a musical instrument will be considered assets.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.
-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210.

Veteran Gray resigns from House of Commons

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's Jewish voice in Parliament and the cabinet has been reduced by one with the unexpected departure from politics of Herb Gray in the wake of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's cabinet shuffle last week.

Gray, one of the longest-serving MPs in Canadian history and deputy prime minister until the shuffle, will head the Canadian section of the International Joint Commission, which monitors air and water quality issues between Canada and the United States.

Through 40 years and eight prime ministers, Gray ascended to the highest level of any Jewish politician in Canada. He ran and won in 13 straight elections, beginning in 1962 with a victory, in his first attempt, in the seat of Windsor West.

His resignation from the Commons reduces the number of Jewish MPs to five, and leaves just one in cabinet, as Elinor Caplan was shifted from citizenship and immigration to minister of national revenue – a move some observers saw as a demotion.

Herb Gray

Gray, 70, relinquished the title of deputy prime minister, a post he assumed in 1997, to the man who emerged as the biggest winner in Chrétien's shuffle, John Manley.

Earlier this month in an interview with The CJN, Gray defended his attendance at a global gathering in Israel of elected Jewish politicians from around the world. Canada was the only participating nation to have sent two senior cabinet ministers to the conference, Gray and Caplan, in addition to three other MPs and two senators.

There was no hint from Gray at the time that he was in his final few days in politics.

Gray was the first Jewish Canadian to become a federal cabinet minister when he was appointed by then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau in 1969.

In lauding his long-time colleague and friend, Chrétien said Gray "has been a public servant in the truest and best sense of the term. It has been a great honour to serve with him."

Manley also took time to praise Gray: "His service as a minister has been outstanding and his shoes are very large ones to fill."

One indication of how warmly Gray was regarded was reflected in a rare honour last week. Prior to leaving cabinet, Gov.-Gen. Adrienne Clarkson awarded Gray the title of Right Honourable, the highest designation public officeholders can have in Canada. It's usually reserved for current and former prime ministers, governors general and chief justices of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Gray seemed resigned to his new fate.

"Anybody who's in cabinet serves at the behest and request of the prime minister, who can decide to make a change at any time," he was quoted as saying last week. "I recognize that there is a logical end to any type of activity, and it seemed appropriate to use this major shuffle to move on to other challenges."

Gray modelled his political career on the late Paul Martin Sr. and David Croll, the latter a one-time mayor of Windsor, MP and senator, said Gray's long-time friend, Senator Jerry Grafstein.

"He had a conspicuous career unmatched by anybody in public life, both in longevity and contribution" Grafstein told The CJN. "Above all, he had a deep personal integrity."

Gray often said he was especially proud of having turned the post of deputy prime minister from little more than a title into a full-time job, to the extent that Manley's appointment to the position was seen as a promotion.

He served as acting prime minister in the prime minister's absence in the House of Commons.

Although not a flashy personality or dramatic speaker, even critics conceded Gray had a knack for deflecting questions from the Opposition, and was not above trading barbs. In one instance a few years ago, he used several Yiddish words and expressions to rebut a question, but the Speaker stopped him, saying there was no way of knowing whether the words were "parliamentary."

Prior to the Brian Mulroney era, Gray served in several cabinet portfolios, including national revenue, consumer and corporate affairs, industry, trade and commerce, and the treasury board.

When the Tories were in power, he spent six years as Opposition House Leader and nearly a year as Leader of the Opposition after John Turner stepped down and before Chrétien was chosen Liberal leader.

In 1993, following the Liberals' victory, he was named Leader of the Government in the House as well as solicitor general.

Gray always wore a kippah and clutched a silver-clad family Bible, purchased at the Montreal Judaica shop Rodal's, whenever he was sworn into cabinet.

A member of Windsor's Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, Gray believed that what was good for Canadians as a whole was good for the Jewish community, and he was a strong advocate for human rights and freedom of conscience.

Canadian Jewish Congress is studying the cabinet shuffle, says Eric Vernon of CJC's Ottawa office. Congress will soon seek a meeting with the new justice minister, Martin Cauchon, to review communal priorities such as Nazi war criminals, hate crimes and hate on the Internet, Vernon said.

LETTERS:

Premier Praises Our Jewish Citizens

There is not a vestige of racial antagonism or bigotry in Newfoundland, Premier Smallwood has declared. In a letter to a national Jewish organization, the Premier expressed his pride in the fact that "Newfoundlanders are tolerant and broad-minded." He was commenting on the great, and universal respect that all residents of this province have for members of the Newfoundland Jewish community. Here is the full text of Mr. Smallwood's letter to the Chairman of the Canadian Jewish Literary Foundation:

The Government of the Province of Newfoundland
THE PREMIER
St. John's

Dr. E. Gottesman,
Chairman, Editorial Board,
The Canadian Jewish Literary Foundation,
186 Adelaide Street West,
Toronto 1, Ontario.

18 January, 1962.

Dear Doctor Gottesman:

It is difficult to write something special about the Jewish people who are in Newfoundland, because they have blended so perfectly into our Newfoundland life as to form part of it and to be indistinguishable from it. We never notice whether a man is Jewish or not, in Newfoundland. We have such a distinctive Newfoundland viewpoint of our own, which is in so many ways different from anything to be found in the rest of Canada, and is so pronounced and different, that anyone coming to live amongst us quickly falls into place as one of us, sharing in our special viewpoints and accepting our special tastes, likes and dislikes. This is true even of so distinctive a people as the Jews. That is why we find so many cases, in Newfoundland, of Jews being amongst the leaders in the expression of our distinctive Island culture.

I am intensely proud of the fact that Newfoundlanders are tolerant and broadminded. There is not even a vestige of racial antagonism or bigory here. In every walk of life Jewish people are regarded and treated as just so many more Newfoundlanders. They are universally respected knd liked, for the sufficient reason that they are good people.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours,
J. R. SMALLWOOD,
Premier.

THE HERALD is glad to endorse Mr. Smallwood's sentiments and knows that all Newfoundlanders will do likewise.

FROM THE ARCHIVES: A letter from Premier Joey Smallwood to Jewish Newfoundlanders 40 years ago. Thanks to L. Nathanson of Toronto.

WARMING UP WINTER: Senior kindergarten students at the United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus recently raised more than $600 to buy jackets, snowsuits, scarves and mittens for Jewish children in need. Each student made a tzedakah box and collected money for one month. Proceeds were presented to Jewish Family & Child Service communications manager Karen Paikin, centre. With Paikin are students Yael Matlow, left, and Joshua Nash.

CJC to take up issues with new ministers

CJC is seeking amendments to the Criminal Code to beef up the government's recently passed anti-terrorism law, Bill C-36. The law considers attacks on houses of worship and cemeteries to be hate crimes, but CJC would like the law expanded to include attacks on communal property, schools and community centres.

Vernon said Congress is "concerned" that the multiculturalism portfolio has been folded into a larger post: labour, status of women and multiculturalism, now held by Claudette Bradshaw.

The new citizenship and immigration minister, Denis Coderre, will also hear from CJC on the continuing need to strip Nazi war criminals of their Canadian citizenship should they be found to have lied about their past.

Congress also seeks "a fair and compassionate" immigration policy, but one that keeps terrorists and modern-day war criminals out, Vernon said.

At the Canadian Heritage ministry, still held by Sheila Copps, CJC's priorities remain the enactment of a federal statute that would set aside a day to commemorate the Holocaust, as well as the establishment of a free-standing Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

At foreign affairs, now held by Toronto MP Bill Graham, Congress's agenda includes anti-terrorism measures, recognition of Israel's Magen David Adom, anti-Semitism in Europe and the former Soviet republics, and the use of international forums to attack Israel.

Canada to send 19 delegates to World Zionist Congress

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada will send 19 delegates to the World Zionist Congress, to be held in Jerusalem June 17-20.

That's up from the 16 delegates Canada sent to the last congress in 1997.

Canada was originally allotted 16 representatives for the 2002 congress, but the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) petitioned the World Zionist Organization (WZO) to boost the number, based on a larger, and more active, Canadian population.

World Zionist Congresses are held every four or five years and bring Zionists to Israel from around the world to hammer out priorities and policies of the WZO.

The breakdown of the Canadians is as follows:

- United Torah Coalition (Orthodoxy's Zionist arm, comprising Mizrachi and Emunah): Four delegates;
- Arza Canada (Reform): Four;
- Mercaz Canada (Conservative): Three;
- Labor Zionist Coalition (comprising Labor Zionist Alliance of Canada, Na'amat, and Friends of Pioneering Israel): Three;
- Herut-Likud Canada: Three;
- Zionist Organization of Canada (ZOC): One;
- Gesher Mizrachi, a Sephardi Orthodox group: One.

Each delegate is entitled to bring at least one alternate.

As expected, the CZF did not hold nationwide elections for delegates, saying they would be too costly and potentially divisive.

In the United States, elections to fill the 145 seats allotted to the American delegation are almost always marred by public barbs between Reform and Orthodox groups.

Norman Stern, the CZF's national vice-president, as well as president of Mercaz Canada, said no election is necessary in Canada "as long as there's 100 percent agreement" on the delegation's makeup.

There were no Canadian elections to the last two congresses either.

Stern said elections would have been expensive. As well, "in an election, there's mudslinging and words that shouldn't be said. That's the last thing we needed given the situation in Israel."

Traditionally, Israel receives 40 per cent of delegates, and the United States about 30 per cent

The makeup of the Canadian delegation is based on membership in each group, Stern said. "Is everyone happy?" he asked. "Probably not." Some 500 delegates are expected at this summer's congress, the 34th.

Traditionally, Israel receives some 40 per cent of delegates, and the United States about 30 per cent, with the remainder from the rest of the world.

The WZO shares responsibility for the $350 million annual budget of its organizational partner, the powerful Jewish Agency, with most of that money earmarked for immigrant absorption and education. A large chunk of those funds comes from North American United Jewish Appeals.

Stern expects the congress will discuss major issues such as tourism to Israel and how to get young people more committed to the Jewish state, despite the current turmoil.

In the United States, Reform and Orthodox groups are again trading sharp words over election tactics.

In the last U.S. election five years ago, ARZA/World Union, the Reform movement's Zionist arm, emerged as the clear victor, winning nearly 48 per cent of the American ballots.

That translated into 70 of 145 seats, and led to twice as much funds for its programs – $2 million – from the Jewish Agency.

Record sales of Israel Bonds in 2001

TORONTO — Sales of Israel Bonds last year, both worldwide and in Canada, were by far the highest in history, said the executive vice-president for Israel Bonds in Canada.

Last year, worldwide sales rose more than 20 percent to $1.09 billion. This surpassed a previous high set during the Gulf War year of 1991.

Canadian sales were up by more than 50 percent over 2000 and there was a 12.5 percent rise in the number of clients, said Lawrence Waller.

Specific numbers were not released, but in a typical year, Canada accounts for 10 percent of worldwide sales, and in 2001, the figure was closer to 15 percent.

Waller said many things contributed to the success of Israel Bonds in Canada. "Certainly, the intense support for Israel in times of crisis is a major factor. But we are also benefiting from vastly improved customer service, a wide range of investment options, and most especially, above-average market rates."

The announcement of the Canadian results came after the Israeli Ministry of Finance said it will permit the sale of Israel Bonds to reach an unprecedented $1.25 billion (US) in 2002.

Gideon Patt, president and CEO of Israel Bonds, worldwide, said "the exceptional results in 2001 demonstrate Israel Bonds' ability to inject capital into Israel's development budget and maintain contacts with an increasing number of people and entities.

"Israel Bonds account for over half of the external, foreign loan needs of the Israeli Treasury in a calendar year," he said.

Implications of Karine-A affair

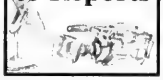
Among the limited media attention devoted to Israel's seizure of the Karine-A cargo ship carrying fifty tons of heavy weaponry, there was some carping about how Israel had used the incident to mount a propaganda victory over Yasser Arafat.

Much of the western media, however, has ignored the important story concerning the growing alliance between the Palestinan Authority (PA) and Iran.

Robert Satloff, executive director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, has written an article called "Karine-A: The Strategic Implications of Iranian-Palestinian Collusion" (Policywatch, Jan. 15) that should be required reading for all journalists concerned with the Middle East. Satloff argues that the Iranian-Palestinian-Hezbollah collusion to smuggle heavy weapons from Iran to the PA has "profound strategic implications for the Middle East."

After outlining the traditional animosity between the fundamentalist Iranian regime and the secular PA, Satloff argues that Karine-A proves that, at least on the tactical level, both parties have set aside that animosity in order to join in a military confrontation against Israel.

According to Reports



Satloff is furthermore troubled by the United States' acceptance of this collusion. It has, Satloff says, so far refused to deal with its implications for two reasons: first, because the Karine-A represents "the worst nightmare scenario of the Arab-Israeli peace process" and second, because "dealing with the implications of the Karine-A will, in the short term, threaten the tranquil U.S.-Arab ties that the administration sought so assiduously to preserve."

It is irresponsible for some journalists to underplay the significance of the PA's intentions by romanticizing their arms acquisition as either "justified resistance to occupation" or as being equivalent to how the Jews in the Yishuv acquired arms for use against the British.

Missing from media coverage of the Middle East conflict is any serious discussion of Iran and Iraq's rapid proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. The top priority for the United States – in fact, for all western powers, including Canada – should be efforts to check Iran's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) program. Former Iranian president Hashemi Rafsanjani's recently declared nuclear threat against Israel highlights how much of a danger Iran's weapons of mass destruction can pose.

Instead of campaigning against Israel's nuclear weapons (developed solely for defensive purposes), some leading intellectuals and artists should be raising alarm bells about Iran – and Iraq's – nuclear campaign, the declared purpose of which is offensive and hence destabilizing, not only for Israel but for the entire Middle East and beyond.

U.S. to review relations with PA

By ALUF BENN and NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. officials will meet soon to review relations with the Palestinian Authority (PA) in the aftermath of the capture of the Karine A weapons ship earlier this month.

During the discussion, which is to be held when U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell returns to Washington, D.C., from his Asian tour, U.S. officials will decide whether special peace envoy Anthony Zinni is to be sent to the region.

After the meeting, U.S. President George Bush will brief Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon about his administration's decision.

Powell made clear earlier this week that the U.S. has not withdrawn its demand that the PA furnish explanations about the Karine A affair. Interviewed in Tokyo by ABC, Powell said "I hope that [Arafat] will take us very seriously, and supply answers" to the U.S. questions about PA involvement.

Despite criticism stirred by the Karine A affair, it does not appear the Bush administration will sever relations with the PA and Chairman Yasser Arafat. U.S sources say the Bush administration will continue to demand Arafat "reduce the threat" of future attacks by dismantling the terror infrastructure maintained by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Top U.S. officials who met in recent days in Washington with IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz acknowledged that the loading of weapons by Iran on a boat headed for the PA has strategic implications for Israel and the region. But, the U.S. officials told Mofaz, it is not clear whether this new strategic reality requires a change in U.S. policy.

In his ABC interview, Powell refrained from criticizing steps taken by the IDF in retaliation for the terror attack last week in Hadera. But he did note that in a vicious circle of violence, "when one response leads to a counter-response," there is "no progress."

IDF takes over Tulkarm

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority will file a complaint to the United Nations Security Council and demand the council immediately convene to discuss Israel's actions in the territories, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat's senior advisor, said Monday.

Dozens of tanks backed by helicopters took over Tulkarm before dawn Monday, imposing a curfew and arresting dozens of suspected militants. The incursion marks the first time Israeli troops have taken control of an entire Palestinian city since the start of the uprising in the West Bank and Gaza.

In gunfire between IDF forces and armed Palestinians Monday, a 19-year-old gunman was killed and a 42-year-old civilian was critically wounded, Palestinian doctors said. Seven more were also wounded in the clashes.

At least five Palestinians were arrested in house-to-house searches in Tulkarm, most of them suspected Hamas activists.

The IDF said the operation was ordered because Tulkarm was "a focus of terrorism" and that many terrorists had launched their operations from there. At the beginning of the operation, authorities announced that the IDF measures were directed against "terrorist infrastructures" and not the PA.

Responding to Palestinian charges that Israel had re-conquered and re-occupied the town, IDF Colonel Yair Golan, commander of the Nahal infantry brigade said, "We have not come to settle in Tulkarm, but we will sit here for as long as we feel that we have further preventive policies that we should carry out within the city."

The raid came in reprisal for a string of shooting attacks, including one by a Palestinian on a banquet hall in Israel last week. The assailant killed six Israelis before being shot dead by Israeli police.

Deep Inside Israel

Imagine the Negev desert as a huge ocean several hundred million years ago. As millions of years go by, the Negev ocean rushes northward, with rivers feeding into it changing course and carving out the inside of a crater. As the crater deepens, rock formations – ancient beyond comprehension – come to light in dazzling colours.

Welcome to the Ramon Crater, Israel's grand canyon, a world wonder in desert surroundings, just half an hour from Eilat's beautiful beaches.

The Ramon Crater looks like a tall heart – 40 kilometres long, 2-10 kilometres wide and 500 metres deep. Bordered by mountains and frequently visited by desert animals, the crater is a spectacular tourist site. Among its attractions, you'll find a black hill which was once an active volcano, clay hills in yellow and red and a natural water source at the crater's lowest level. This entire area, by the way, was once a stop on the spice trail where traders traveled with their spices from India and other countries to the port of Gaza.

The best place to begin this geological journey through the ages would be the visitors Centre in Mitzpe Ramon, the closest town nearby, built as a camp nearly 50 years ago for the men who constructed the highway to Eilat. Getting there is easy either by car or with one of the many tours originating from Eilat. Just contact us at IGTO for more information.

Next week: A trip to Israel's desert capital.

TRAVEL ISRAEL is produced and sponsored by the Israel Government Tourist Office.

IDF, civilian experts divided on Iran

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

A lack of quality intelligence hampers Israel's ability to assess the threat posed by Iran. Intelligence agencies find it almost impossible to penetrate Iran – even countries friendly with Tehran's Islamic regime lack adequate intelligence on developments there. Israel has only a fuzzy picture of what goes on inside the regime.

"I've never heard of any agency that pretends to have information about what's happening there," says one well-placed Israeli official. "Most of the information that we get is technical in character, about capabilities." The source admitted Israeli officials are held at a disadvantage by the paucity of information about Iranian intentions.

The only real information Israel gets about Tehran's plans "comes from the regime's public declarations – this could itself be an [intelligence] failure since it's not always clear whether declarations can be taken at face value," the source said.

As Israel Defence Forces (IDF) intelligence officials see it, Iran has for years advocated Israel's destruction and has systematically devised policies geared to this objective. To reinforce this bleak view, IDF officers point to a long list of incendiary declarations made by Tehran's leaders over the years, calling for Israel's annihilation. They believe the Iranians mean what they say. As they accelerate efforts to procure nuclear weapons, the IDF warns, Iranian officials see Israel as a potential target.

Also, the IDF claims, Tehran sees the Palestinians' "terror campaign" as an opportunity to advance the strategic goal. Iran has shown increasing readiness to back the intifadah, as exemplified by Tehran's sending the Karine A ship, loaded with weapons, to the Palestinian Authority.

IDF intelligence analysts keep tabs on internal tensions in Iran, but do not believe proponents of reform pose a serious challenge to the hard-line Islamic leadership. At most, the IDF experts believe, some thaw in Iran's Islamic regime could occur after a five- or six-year period. For now, they say, the reformers have not exerted any influence on Iran's foreign policy, which is crafted by Ayotallah Ali Khameini's religious leadership.

IDF military analysts and other intelligence officials stress other aspects of Iran's systematic offensive against Israel:

- Hezbollah has 8,000 missiles in Southern Lebanon, 300 of which are long- range weapons controlled directly by Iran.
- In addition to support for Hezbollah, Iranian links with Hamas and Islamic Jihad continue.
- The Iranians try to radicalize Israeli Arabs, particularly by influencing Israel's Islamic movement.

This dark picture painted by IDF officers is not shared by well-placed civilian figures. Non-military Israelis who have met with Iranians believe popular pressure will bring change in the country. They say there are important, dissident voices in Iran that must not be overlooked.

Though Israel and Iran do not have official contacts, semi-secret discussions have been held in recent years ostensibly between academics, in what are called "Twin-Track" channels sponsored by western research institutions.

Participants in these contacts have included Brig. Gen. (ret.) Shlomo Brom from the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University and ambassador Oded Eran, who has been a senior member of Israeli negotiation teams with the Palestinians.

As Brom and Eran see it, Israel is not a main item on Iran's foreign policy agenda. The regime adopts a militant stance toward Israel, Brom and Eran believe, mainly for internal, domestic purposes. Iran's major strategic concerns are much closer to home, and involve Iraq, the Gulf states, Afghanistan and some republics in the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS).

Brom and Eran's view partly resembles that of Mossad head Ephraim Halevy. Last month, Halevy referred somewhat elliptically to "hidden signals about the possibility of reconciliation" with Israel that can be heard in Tehran. These signals, the Mossad chief stressed, are not as significant right now as the "harsh, stridently" anti-Israel noises in Iran, and yet the more moderate voices exist nonetheless. Halevy's remark was interpreted by Israeli sources as a reference to moderate elements in Iran, who can be contacted by sources in Israel.

In Israel's Foreign Ministry, officials say the anti-Israel hostility of the Islamic revolution in Iran remains intact and Iran's President Mohammad Khatami upholds the anti-Israeli position despite his reputation as a moderate. If there are voices calling for reconciliation with Israel, they are on the margins of the Iranian regime, the officials stress.

Recently, several senior Foreign Ministry officials proposed that Israel take steps to reduce tensions with Tehran and send a message to reform-inclined members of the Iranian leadership that Jerusalem has no intention of threatening their country, meddling in its internal affairs or taking steps to topple the Islamic regime.

Vatican calls Nazareth mosque 'unacceptable' to Christians

By ORI NIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In an unprecedented public attack, the Vatican representative dealing with the controversy surrounding the Shihab al-Din mosque in Nazareth described the construction project as "a clear provocation."

Addressing the special ministerial committee convened to assess the dispute among the Christians and Muslims in Nazareth, Father Pierbattista Pizzaballa said that the initiative to build the mosque in close proximity to the Basilica of the Annunciation "is unacceptable to the Christian world."

He added that "the mosque, at this site, is solely meant to interfere in one of the holiest places of the Christian world."

For its part the committee, which met last Thursday for the first time under the leadership of Housing Minister Nathan Sharansky, is unlikely to meet the two-week deadline set by the kitchen cabinet last week, for presenting its recommendations on the issue.

The committee heard from the two disputing parties, representatives of both the Christian churches and of the Wakf Muslim religious trust, about the complexities involved in the sensitive issue.

After the presentation made by each side, the committee chairman, Sharansky ruled the committee must experience the issue first-hand by visiting the construction site at the heart of the dispute.

He also concluded the question surrounding the construction of the mosque needs to be addressed anew for two reasons: the failure of the Muslims to meet their obligations in an agreement signed with a committee headed by then public security minister Shlomo Ben-Ami; and the fact that this is the first time that the position of the Christians is being adequately voiced.

First to present their case were the Christian representatives, who described Nazareth as the "cradle of Christianity."

Pizzaballa stressed the issue at hand was the character of the city and that "from the start, the Muslim's intention was not one of coexistence but the opposite."

He emphasized the Wakf's plans to construct a mosque that was large enough to obstruct the Basilica of the Annunciation, which dominates the Nazareth skyline.

Some of the committee members questioned why this is the first time the Christian representatives presented their case clearly and assertively.

Pizzaballa explained that the reluctance to go on the offensive stemmed from a wish "not to offend the Muslims," on the one hand, but also because of the numerical inferiority of Christians in the area.

Wakf representatives, including its head in Nazareth, Ahmed Salah Hamouda, and one of the leaders of the Islamic Movement, Salman Abu-Ahmad, argued their side has already given up more than half the area on which the mosque was due to be constructed.

Muslims are the new anti-Semites, UK rabbi says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks says Muslims are the archetypal anti-Semites of the new millennium, while the State of Israel plays the role of the classically persecuted Jew.

"It's moved from Europe to the Middle East, from Christian culture to Islamic; from the individual Jew to the Jews as a sovereign nation. But essentially it remains the same: the inability, or at worst refusal, to grant Jews a space," Rabbi Sacks said in an interview with Ha'aretz.

Sacks sees this as the backdrop to a current, two-track surge of anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom – among the country's two million Muslims and among the left-liberal media. Uninhibited disparagement of Jews has become rampant, and even acceptable, at London dinner parties, and Jewish community leaders are voicing concern.

"The anti-Israel media have taken the Arab propaganda line on board," says Lord Greville Janner.

But others warn against against the tendency to regard every criticism of Israel as an expression of anti-Semitism.

Across the Channel, meanwhile, a wave of Jew-hatred seems to be inundating France, eliciting grave concern in the 600,000-strong Jewish community there. Synagogues have been fire-bombed, schools have been attacked and individuals have been cursed and harassed on the street.

Compensation for the post-war restoration of securities rights and the Puttkammer List in the Netherlands

Stichting Individuele Effectenaanspraken Sjoa

The Central Jewish Board in the Netherlands and the Israel Platform of former Dutchman in Israel have established a foundation to award three kinds of war claims. If you believe you are eligible for such a benefit, please complete the form enclosed. The new Foundation for Individual Securities Claims Shoah (Stichting Individuele Effectenaanspraken Sjoa) provides the following:

- Compensation for the gap in the post-war restoration of securities rights
  In and after 1953 the Restoration of Securities Rights Guarantee Fund refunded only 90% of the value of the value of the securities stolen by the Nazis to the entitled Jewish individuals. The foundation is now awarding the missing 10% to those able to prove that they received a payment of 90% at the time.
- Compensation for the Puttkammer commission
  The Foundation has a list of names – see www.sie-sjoa.nl – of Jews who surrendered jewellery to Puttkammer during WWII in the hope of avoiding deportation. Puttkammer charged commission for his services. The Foundation is now refunding half of this commission to the persons whose names appear on this list.
- Restitution of safe-deposit box expenses
  During WWII banks charged their Jewish clients for having to break open their safe-deposit boxes. If you show that your safe-deposit box was broken open at the time, and that you were paid the cost, you will be eligible for a refund.
- Successors are included
  All three of the above provisions also apply to the successors of those who have died and have the required substantiating documents.

If you send the form to the address indicated below, you will receive an application form containing details about the provisions. Deadline for submission is 31 December 2002.

Israel woos French Jewish emigres

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — The Israeli government has stepped into the fray of Jewish politics in France.

Following the latest anti-Semitic attack – the firebombing of a Jewish school in the Paris suburb of Creteil in the early hours of the new year – Israel's deputy foreign minister, Michael Melchior, sharply denounced the French authorities and French society for tolerating such violence.

"France is the worst Western country concerning anti-Semitism," Melchior told the French daily Le Monde.

Referring to the 320 acts of anti-Jewish aggression reported by the Jewish community in 2001, Melchior condemned "French society" for not reacting forcefully enough when the incidents began.

"The political leaders and intellectuals did not take them seriously enough," Melchior said of the dramatic rise in anti-Semitic violence that began with the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000.

Melchior's comments came at the same time that Israel issued a communique stating that, in light of "the wave of anti-Semitism in France," French Jews emigrating to Israel would receive the best aid package offered by the Israeli government.

This aid status is also granted to immigrants from Russia and other countries of the former Soviet Union. It also was recently granted to Jews emigrating from Argentina and South Africa.

The aid allocation allows newly arrived immigrants to live for seven months without having to spend any of their personal savings. The sum ranges from about $4,500 dollars for a student to $13,000 for a family with two children under age 4.

The communique justified Israel's decision by stating that 40 per cent of France's 600,000 Jews live surrounded by Muslim hostility.

"The wave of anti-Semitism that strikes in France offers an opportunity to the state of Israel to bring in thousands of Jews," Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said in the communique.

In their immediate responses to Melchior's remarks, top French Jewish leaders criticized Israel's reading of French anti-Semitism.

Jean Kahn, the president of the Consistoire of France and an instrumental figure in lobbying the Israel government to give French olim enhanced benefits, called Melchior's statements "a bit over the top."

"There is in France a wave of anti-Semitism, different from the old anti-Semitism of the Dreyfuss affair," he explained. "Its authors are of Maghrebin origin and somewhat on the left."

Roger Cukierman, president of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations, took a similar perspective.

"The traditional anti-Semitism of the extreme right is not as serious in France," he said. "The anti-Jewish acts committed in the last year here are very clearly localized in communities where Jew and Maghrebin live side by side."

Most surprising, perhaps, was the reaction of Eli Barnavi, Israel's ambassador to France.

Interviewed on Israeli radio, Barnavi said that "all the polls reveal a state of increasing integration for the Jewish community."

The polls also "show that only some 10 per cent of the French population manifests any anti-Semitic feelings," Barnavi said.

French President Jacques Chirac refused to comment on Melchior's criticism. But he said in a recent meeting with French religious leaders, he reconfirmed his "severe condemnation of all anti-Semitic acts."

Sharon, who formally has retained the post of absorption minister since his government took power last March, hopes to take advantage of the ferment in the French Jewish community over the Socialist government's refusal to take a hard line against anti-Semitic violence.

One of Sharon's priorities as prime minister has been to increase the Jewish population in Israel. The number of olim, or immigrants, from France – which has Europe's largest Jewish community – has been flagging during the past few years.

In 2001, some 1,200 French Jews emigrated to Israel, a 20 per cent drop from the previous year. The decline might reflect concern about rising Arab terrorism in the country.

Such concerns persist in many Jewish communities here, particularly in Paris and its surrounding suburbs, but signs are beginning to appear of a revived interest in aliyah, or immigration to Israel, among French Jews.

Last fall, the French office of the Jewish Agency for Israel reported a sharp increase in the number of Jews requesting information about aliyah.

According to Dov Puder, the Jewish Agency's director, many of the potential olim were "bothered" by the problem of anti-Semitic aggression.

"They are motivated by the situation in France as much as the situation in Israel, but they are more concerned than in the past with the situation in France," Puder said.

Melchior's polemic against France, leaked to French correspondents in Jerusalem to coincide with the release of Sharon's communique, appears intended to give a boost of encouragement to such people who may be considering aliyah.

Israel's new financial incentives may be enough to motivate families of Sephardi Jews from the working-class suburbs of the Paris region.

Many of the most recent anti-Semitic acts have struck schools and synagogues in subsidized housing areas inhabited both by Sephardi Jews and Maghrebins, Arabs of North African descent.

France's sluggish economy has made it difficult for many Jewish families to put aside the kind of savings that relocation would require.

Participants rave over Birthright Israel experience

Altogether, $210 million U.S. over five years has been earmarked to the program, with a goal of bringing 100,000 young people to Israel.

With varied schedules that ran the gamut from Shabbat at the Western Wall to a Saturday night disco party, Birthright offered its most recent participants a broad exposure to the Jewish State.

Approximately 6,000 young Jews – including 800 Canadians – from around the world took part in the latest Birthright trip, which ran from late December to early January. They were divided into dozens of groups of 30 to 40 each, travelling together on buses and lodging in hotels, kibbutz guest-houses and even in Bedouin tents.

The groups travelled from Metullah in the north to Eilat in the south. They hiked mountains, traversed nature reserves, dunked in the Dead Sea and prayed at the Western Wall.

A mega-event at Binyanei Ha'uma brought together thousands of participants for an evening program that included comedy, music and dance. The night culminated in a disco inferno that saw hundreds crowd a dance floor.

Numbers were down from earlier trips, when as many as 12,000 young people participated and interest was so strong that participants were chosen by lottery. There were virtually no new bookings following the Sept. 11 bombings, said U.S. Birthright spokesperson Joe Wagner.

Bronfman, a Montrealer, said in a news conference that organizers feared a "weak showing" but were gratified 6,000 chose to participate.

Given the uncertain security situation – several Birthright participants said family and friends raised concerns over their safety in Israel – this year's group was no doubt highly motivated, perhaps more so than in previous years.

At Binyanei Ha'uma, the Canadians raved about their Birthright experiences, but they saved their most emotive comments for their Israeli counterparts, IDF soldiers who joined them on their bus for a couple of days of touring.

The mifgash – the meeting – provided "unfiltered" exposure to average Israelis, said 19-year-old Yair Rabinovich, a student at Toronto's Seneca College. "We look at everything on the sidelines, but they live it," he said. "They tell it to you like it is."

Moshe Sakal, 22, agreed. "They don't live in fear or anger. The way they function in the army is through love of the country.

"In Israel, you get the feeling of family… Everyone knows someone who's been affected by terrorism."

"It's like an injection of reality," chimed in Marcos Benaim, 19, a student at York University in Toronto.

Still, he said, "you feel nurtured when you come here. When you see soldiers, you know they come to protect you."

Roman Marants, 19, agreed. A visit to an army base "really grabbed my heart. I'm thinking, I should be in their shoes."

A native of Moldova in the former Soviet Union, Marants spent 2½ years in Israel as a child before moving to Toronto with his family. "When I came to Israel on the plane, I felt I was home," he said.

A different, somewhat older busload of young people from across Canada repeated many of the same sentiments during a tour of Jerusalem.

For David Nataf of Montreal, the Birthright trip marked his first visit to Israel. A financial services officer with National Bank, Nataf, 25, grew up in an observant home. For him, touching the Western Wall was a particularly emotional experience.

"I wanted to have that moment of discovery," he said. "Jerusalem is very beautiful, the most beautiful place I've ever seen."

The mifgash with Israeli soldiers was also memorable. Expecting them to be "harsh," Nataf was surprised to find "they were very much like us, but I think they enjoy life more."

Marissa Sidel, a native of Montreal, thought the visit to Israel was particularly important as a demonstration of Jewish solidarity. Though Birthright marked her first trip to Israel, she plans to return in the summer to get a better idea of the day-to-day lives of ordinary Israelis as a possible prelude to aliyah.

Sidel, 26, felt energized by Israeli society and its life "on the edge… Here, no matter what the topic is, Israelis launch themselves into it wholeheartedly… They care, they don't just roll over."

Sharonne Katz, a Winnipegger who now lives in Fredericton, was one of 15 Maritimers in Israel with Birthright. Although she lived in Israel for three years between the ages of 10 and 13, the Birthright trip allowed her to share the experience with contemporaries and to see Israel "through their eyes."

Her group, which began its tour in Europe with an "anguish-to-hope" itinerary, visited the death camps where Jewish life ended and then witnessed its rebirth in Israel, she said.

A highlight for her was visiting the synagogue at Masada, which was used 2,000 years ago and which still hosts services today.

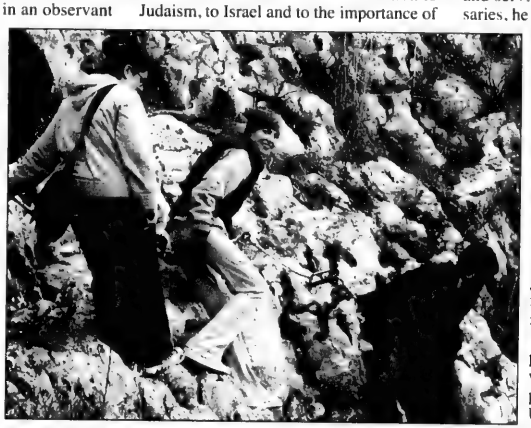
Leonard Saxe is a social psychologist and professor at Brandeis University. He and his team have been studying the Birthright program to determine its long term impact on participants.

Based on pre- and post-Birthright interviews with a large sample of participants, as well as the responses to questions by a control group that did not go on the trip, Saxe's preliminary conclusions are that "the program works.

"As you can see, the kids are turned on by it. It's an extraordinarily powerful experience for them.

"Those who go look different than those who don't in terms of their connection to Judaism, to Israel and to the importance of Judaism in their lives. Their behaviour did not change as much as their attitudes have."



[Dafna Lorber photos]

Findings from Canadian participants diverge somewhat from those of the U.S. group, Saxe said. Generally, the Canadians are older and more seem to be "already committed to Judaism and more likely to be immigrants or first-generation groups."

The American participants mirror the broader U.S. Jewish population, exhibiting a lower level of affiliation to Jewish life.

Nevertheless, "across the board the program has attracted an interesting mix of people. It's not just the Orthodox, but also those who had no connection" to Judaism, Saxe said. One bus, he noted, had young people wearing kippot, while others on the bus did not know what a kippah was.

Saxe said Birthright participants return home thinking Israel and Judaism are important in their lives, and some go on to increase their involvement in Jewish activities, whether through university courses or in community activism. That behavioural part of the equation is limited at this point, he added, pointing out many are still focused on their careers.

Rabbi Reuven Poupko, chair of the Canada Israel Experience Centre, the national organization that coordinated participation in Birthright for most Canadians, agreed that "the responses of the kids are breathtaking." Participants return to their communities raving about the experience and serving as the program's best emissaries, he said.

Ariela Cotler, president of Hillel Montreal, acknowledged numbers were down from previous trips, but those who do participate often return extremely motivated. One group of Birthright alumni helped organize a fashion show that raised almost $10,000 for the families of IDF soldiers, she said.

"In every Jew there is a seed," Cotler said. "In some, it's nourished. What we're doing here is giving it some nourishment. How it opens is unknown, but I'm sure it opens."

Forty per cent of the participants in the winter 2002 program were from the United States, 26 per cent from the former Soviet Union, 15 per cent from Canada, 10 per cent from Latin America, six per cent from Europe and three per cent from Australia. Students from Paraguay, Hungary and Morocco participated for the first time.

Birthright is a partnership between Jewish philanthropists, the government of Israel and local Jewish communities through United Jewish Communities, an umbrella group representing local federations.

Paul Lungen participated in the program as a guest of Birthright Israel.

Slip Knot actor finds art imitates life

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ironically, Ukrainian born, Toronto based actor, Dmitry Chepovetsky, 31, shares some similarities with the character he portrays in Ken Gass' production of Slip Knot, running until Feb. 3rd at Toronto's Factory Theatre's Mainstage, 125 Bathurst Street.

Both Chepovetsky and the fictional Jonathan Kruger have worked in the film industry and are sons of immigrant engineer fathers who live in Vancouver. Luckily, for the Chepovetsky clan, their future is much brighter.

"Slip Knot is about redemption," Chepovetsky says. In short, the play is about two men, Fritz and William, Jonathan's father, who spent time in Dachau together as officers and confront one another much later in Vancouver. One has a secret over the other. "William has moved on and created this great life and Fritz has still been harbouring it for 50 years, or so," explains Chepovetsky.

Dmitry Chepovetsky

"It is all about faith and coincidences," he adds. "My character is a movie gaffer, who has always had an intense relationship with his father. The father comes from a Germanic background. In the process of my character coming back for his father's birthday, we end up at Fritz's funeral, where I meet Fritz's daughter, everything evolves from this."

Chepovetsky can relate to being unaware of one's roots. "Being a child of an immigrant, there are so many things you don't know. Then you get to a certain age, as Jonathan does, when he is confronted on certain issues by Fritz's daughter, he starts to defend his father's background without actually knowing why," states the actor.

Chepovetsky moved to Regina when he was 7 years old and was performing in theatricals by the age of 14. He thinks as he gets older the memories of coming to Canada are fewer and far between, but he remembers having to learn a new language – he's fluent in Ukrainian and Russian, learning a new culture and freely practicing his religion.

"In the Ukraine, the synagogue in Livov was closed down in '29, so you really couldn't practice Judaism. My grandmother had separate dishes for Passover, but it was used behind closed doors. When we came to Saskatchewan, there was only one synagogue at the time and it was Orthodox. I was immersed in Hebrew school and bar mitzvah lessons," he says.

After graduating from Ryerson University's theatre school and travelling to places like Israel and Turkey, in 1993 Chepovetsky followed his parents to Vancouver and shortly thereafter landed an agent.

"At that time the film industry was just starting up in Vancouver. It was a good time to build a resume and get in on the ground floor. I had really never done film before because theatre was my first passion," he says.

While in Vancouver, Chepovetsky wrote and produced one-night cabarets. Leaving Vancouver in '96 to appear in Picasso At The Lapin Agile at the Manitoba Theatre Centre, he then headed farther east to act in Toronto and Halifax. During a stay in England, he wrote the play Bloodline, about children of immigrants.

The play was later produced in Vancouver, during his two-year return to the West Coast City before arriving back in Toronto in the summer of 2000. In Bloodline, Chepovetsky played a parent – the experience gave him insight into his own parent's prospective.

Chepovetsky's credits are impressive. On stage his work includes Unidentified Human Remains..., Jacques Brel Is Alive & Well and Orphan Muses. In film and television he has appeared in Blue Murder, Haven, Stargate, and three episodes of The X Files, to name a few.

In the spring, his latest offering, K-19: The Widowmaker with Harrison Ford will grace the silver screen. Chepovetsky plays a submarine sonar operator Sergei Maximov. He was hired because he can speak with a Russian accent, but was asked to "Anglophy" it, to sound like his castmates' accents.

"Harrison Ford was great," he says. "I grew up with this man through Star Wars and Indiana Jones. He's very impressive, with a lot of integrity."

Jewish soccer player becomes latest TV Survivor

By ADAM WILLS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — What started out as a joke between friends fast became a million-dollar goal for a retired Jewish soccer player.

Ethan Zohn emerged as the sole survivor of the TV show Survivor during the two-hour Jan. 10 finale, defeating Kim Johnson, a 57-year-old retired teacher from Oyster Bay, N.Y.

"I was happy to do our tribe proud," Zohn said.

Survivor: Africa was recorded last summer in Kenya's arid Shaba National Reserve. Sixteen contestants faced off in a variety of contests over 39 days, braving scorching heat, wild animals and conspiracies.

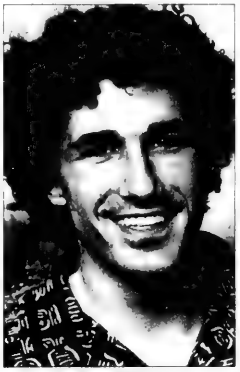
Throughout his life, the curly-haired 27-year-old has held tightly to his Jewish faith, traditions and culture, seeking out synagogues to pray in during Jewish holidays when the soccer teams he played with were on the road. "It's a huge, huge part of my life," he said.

A committed soccer enthusiast, Zohn's journey into the harsh African terrain had a lighthearted beginning.

Zohn played goalie for soccer teams in Zimbabwe, Hawaii and Massachusetts and with the U.S. team in the 1997 Maccabiah Games. Realizing that he wasn't going to be the next soccer superstar, Zohn hung up his cleats in 2000 and took a job with a product-naming firm.

But a sudden hiring freeze ended his foray into full-time employment a day before he was scheduled to start. When he asked friends for job advice, they joked that he should try out for Survivor.

"We made the [audition] video, sent it in and the next thing you know, I got on the show," said Zohn, who earned a reputation for being a nice guy and an introvert as the series unfolded.



Ethan Zohn

Like the winner of Survivor: Australia, Tina Wesson, Zohn emerged victorious without a single elimination vote.

"I'm not the guy who is going to stand up and bark orders and tell people what to do," Zohn said. "I'm more the guy who is going to sit back, observe things – and then based on my observations I'm going to make my moves."

His win wasn't a total surprise. Las Vegas sports book manager Andy DeLuca had Zohn 6-1 odds to win early in the game.

Zohn has nearly gained back the 26 pounds he lost during the show's filming and is getting back into shape. His rugged looks, reticence and honesty made him a fan favourite throughout the season.

For Jews, Zohn's pride in his faith and culture was a refreshing change from some of the evangelical Christians cast in the show's previous seasons.

One of this season's most controversial moments involved what appeared to be an anti-Semitic comment directed at Zohn.

Contestant Tom Buchanan, a goat and cattle farmer from Rich Valley, Va., called Zohn a "Jew boy" after their team won a challenge. Instead of taking offence, Ethan saw it as an opportunity to educate.

"He didn't mean any harm by it and didn't mean it in a derogatory term and he wasn't being a racist," Zohn said. "Tom had never met a Jew before," said Zohn, who also was the first Jew that contestants Clarence Black and Frank Garrison had met.

"It was almost like a blessing. I got the opportunity to educate someone about Judaism. I'd tell him what it's like to be Jewish. He'd tell me what it's like to live on a farm, how to herd goats and sell cattle. It was a learning experience," he said.

Zohn, who attended the Conservative congregation Temple Emunah while growing up in Lexington, Mass., recalls his Jewish upbringing fondly.

And despite the harrowing challenges thrown at Zohn by Survivor, none could rival the challenge this newly minted millionaire faced growing up. It's something Zohn hasn't talked about publicly – the loss of his father to cancer when he was 14.

"I went and I did minyan for the year after," he said. "It was important for me."

In 1997, Zohn qualified to play for the men's U.S. soccer team in the Maccabiah Games. Playing soccer in Israel was a dream come true, Zohn said.

"In my mind it was probably was one of the biggest accomplishments I've made in terms of my soccer," he said. He was slated to play in 2001 until the soccer portion of the games was cancelled when the Maccabiah was scaled back because of the Palestinian intifadah.

Zohn has visited with other Survivor contestants since the series wrapped up. His visit to Buchanan in Virginia made an indelible impression. "It was crazy. I tripled the population of Jews when I walked into that place."

YIDDISH BOOK CENTRE COMPILES LIST OF 100 GREAT JEWISH BOOKS

In a bid to promote notable Jewish books of the past 150 years, the National Yiddish Book Center of Amherst, Ma., has announced a list of The 100 Greatest Works of Modern Jewish Literature.

The list includes works in all languages and will serve as a "re-definition of the Jewish canon," said centre president Aaron Lansky, who described the results as "a fascinating, challenging, sometimes surprising list with books ranging from Mendele to Maus."

He said the "goal is to carry the Jewish story forward – from the Torah, Talmud and other traditional texts to the Jewish literature of our own time."

A distinguished international panel took two years to develop the list from an initial compilation of nearly 600 titles, plus additional recommendations. The list includes novels, plays, poetry and memoirs in English, Yiddish, Hebrew, Russian, French, Spanish, Italian, German and other languages.

Famous and widely-read titles take their place beside lesser-known but equally important, works. The books are listed alphabetically and are not ranked.

Reports indicate that only two titles – Yiddish writer Shalom Aleichem's short story collection Tevye the Dairyman and Henry Roth's Call It Sleep – were included by universal acclaim. Much deliberation surrounded most of the other choices, even apparent "shoe-in" works by Isaac Babel, Franz Kafka, Cynthia Ozick and Philip Roth.

As it happens, only two Philip Roth novels made it onto the list: The Counterlife and The Patrimony. Similarly, only two works by Isaac Bashevis Singer were included: Satan in Goray and the Selected Stories.

Canadians? Mordecai Richler, Leonard Cohen and Adele Wiseman are all absent. The only Canadian represented is A.M. Klein for The Second Scroll.

The final list reflects "a mighty literature," said Harvard Prof. Ruth Wisse, author of The Modern Jewish Canon, who was one of the judges.

To view the full list on the Internet, go to www.yiddishbookcenter.org.

Mural Contest: Lawrence Square, at Lawrence Ave. W. and the Allen Expressway, invites young artists to submit ideas and sketches for two murals, each approximately 20 feet wide by 10 feet high, to be painted at the mall.

The theme of the murals is "Community – All for One, One for All." Designs should depict a loving and caring community, a happy neighbourhood and "an inclusive community where everyone plays an important role."

Submissions are invited from artists in two age groups, 7 to 12 and 13 to 17 years old, with preference given to group submissions. Winning contestants must be ready to paint their murals in mid-February with all materials supplied. Prizes will be awarded to winning contestants and their sponsoring agencies, organizations or schools.

Deadline is Jan. 26, 5 p.m. Submit sketches and ideas to Lawrence Square Mall, Suite 305, 700 Lawrence Ave. W., Toronto M6A 3B4. 416-256-0256.

Documentary Delivers: The London Institute of Contemporary Arts last week began screening the prize-winning documentary Promises, which, according to the London Jewish Chronicle, offers "compelling insights into the Israeli-Palestinian conflict… (by) drawing viewers into the hearts and minds of the children of Jerusalem."

The seven children spotlighted in the film live no more than 15 minutes apart but are locked into mutually exclusive cultural worlds. Filming occurred before the current intifadah erupted but was "prophetic of the period of violence that has followed," the Chronicle said.

Apparently, the Israeli and Palestinian children in the film initially had no intention of meeting each other, but became curious after seeing each others' pictures. "When they saw the photos, somehow they became more comfortable about meeting a child on the other side," said the film's American co-director, B.Z. Goldberg.

Promises won an audience award last year at the Rotterdam Film Festival.

Classic Wayne and Shuster video available from CBC

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Many Canadian cultural and entertainment icons of the past are dying off. First it was Johnny Wayne and then Al Waxman. Now the final curtain has dropped on Frank Shuster.

Shuster and his longtime friend and partner, Johnny Wayne, gave Canadians one of the great comedy teams of all time. Although Wayne and Shuster enjoyed a great deal of popularity and success in the United States, appearing on the Ed Sullivan Show more times than any other act, the two comedians never abandoned their native Canada.

And until Wayne died in 1990, Wayne and Shuster continued to produce new television specials for the CBC every year.

Wayne and Shuster could be schmaltzy and they often incorporated slapstick into their humour, but they were also the most literate comedians on television. They were both well educated and it was obvious they had a solid background in English literature.

In 1986, the CBC released a video called Wayne and Shuster At The Movies that featured three of their greatest Hollywood spoofs, the skits "Kwai Me A River," "Citizen Wayne" and "Dr. Jekyll and Mrs. Hyde."

It should come as no surprise that their first video is devoted to movie spoofs. Shuster spent a large part of his childhood in his father's movie theatre, watching some of the best that Hollywood produced.

In 1996, the CBC released a second video, The Wayne & Shuster Years. This retrospective contains some of the all-time great Wayne and Shuster skits, including the classic "Shakespearean Baseball" and "Rinse The Blood Off My Toga."

This video won me over wholeheartedly and should be in every Canadian's video collection. It is a gem.

The passing of Shuster brings an end to an era of comedy.

Wayne and Shuster started writing and performing their comedy in school and perfected it in the army during World War II. They then spent a number of years performing on radio and later took on the new medium of television, where they scored their biggest successes. Fortunately, we have a few videos that preserve their genius and can entertain us for years to come.

Although Wayne and Shuster At The Movies is not available at the moment, The Wayne & Shuster Years is available for $19.95 from the CBC and can be ordered as follows: Telephone: 1-800-255-7711; Fax:416-205-2139; Mail: CBC Boutique, P.O. Box 500, Station A, Toronto, Ont., M5W 1E6; and on the Internet at www.cbc.ca.

Play explores memory and sorrow

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Garfinkel is off to a promising start.

His first play, Walking to Russia, at the Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace until Jan. 27, is a poignant meditation on the nature of thwarted ambition, identity, memory and sorrow.

Set against the backdrop of two topical and interlocking themes, global warming and famine, Walking to Russia turns on a quarrelsome retired Jewish couple who mourn their daughter, Masha, 30 years after her death.

Masha Berck (Ruth Madoc-Jones), who died on a cold winter day during an hallucinatory fit, flits in and out of the play like a ghostly dybbuk, tormenting her parents.

Ben Berck (Aron Tager), a prescient scientist, and his wife, Bella (Anne Tager-Page), plan to retire to warmer climes in California.

But when he is offered a dream job in Churchill, Manitoba – the land of the polar bears – he accepts without even bothering to consult his wife.

The new post, offered by a former student, will transform him. It will enable him to work on a prized pet project, supposedly let him save the world from environmental disaster and give him a shot at the Nobel Prize.

At 76, Ben will be reborn, as he exults in a moment of euphoria.

Bella is none too keen, and much to Ben's chagrin, she announces her intention to remain in Winnipeg, where the play, skillfully directed by Jennifer Capraru, unfolds in a series of strong vignettes.

Although she is long gone, Masha, a tense figure in a white terrycloth robe, still exerts a profound influence on her parents.

Through her impassioned soliloquies and a number of wrenching flashbacks, we learn telling details about the their respective relationships.

In an explosive scene, Ben, a diehard atheist, is indignant when he discovers that Bella turned to religion and began attending synagogue after her daughter's death.

What, he asks with barely suppressed outrage, has become of the old Bella, the woman who used to be a committed Bundist?

Then, in a painful conversation, Ben and Bella engage in recriminations. Ben maintains that Masha could have been a scientist, like himself, but threw the chance away to study art.

At this juncture, Masha appears, and she and Ben argue fiercely about her career choice.

The upshot is that Masha, at 19, leaves home and cracks up, with fatal consequences.

Garfinkel's play, which runs for 90 uninterrupted minutes, crackles with tension and bursts of verbal fireworks.

Here is a writer who can animate a small, unadorned stage with the joys and tragedies of life.

The performances match the script. Tager shifts seamlessly between mood swings. Tager-Page is a study in stoicism and anguish, while Madoc-Jones plumbs deep emotional depths.

Walking to Russia is a play that rivets attention and enlists empathy.

Solomon's new show a response to post-Sept.11 world

CBC show will aim to expand the concept of television itself

By LARA RABINOWITZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "I was sort of the Duddy Kravitz of the place," says Evan Solomon, host of CBC Newsworld's Hot Type, of his days as a student at McGill University. Instead of taking the usual four years to complete his BA (in English literature) and an additional two years to complete his MA (in film and religious studies), Solomon finished both degrees in less than five years, because, he says, "I wanted to do things in the world... I was in a fever pitch."

At 33, Solomon has yet to slow down. McClelland & Stewart published his first novel, Crossing the Distance, in 1999 and he is currently working on his second. He has written for such magazines and newspapers as the Globe and Mail and The South China Morning Post.

As host of CBC Newsworld's FutureWorld for four seasons, Solomon was nominated for three Gemini Awards (for best host). He is a regular contributor to CBC's National Magazine, as well as CBC Radio's The Arts Tonight, Morningside, This Morning and Ideas.

On Hot Type, his popular show about print culture, Solomon has interviewed authors Elie Wiesel, Salman Rushdie, Margaret Atwood, Susan Sontag, J.K. Rowling and Naomi Wolf, among others. And as a graduate student at McGill, he and his friend, Andrew Heintzman, also at McGill, founded Shift, a magazine about digital culture.

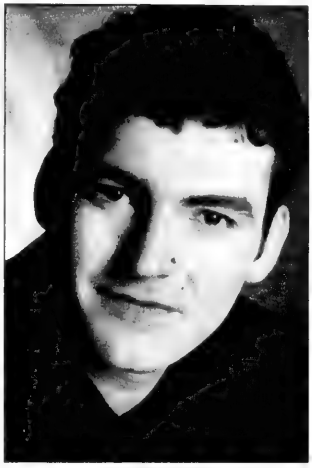
"We were both going nowhere, and our parents were keenly aware of our irrelevance," Solomon says.

"We were young and poor and stupid and ambitious... I like to say we had academentia," he jokes.

The magazine quickly became a hit as the technological revolution created a new medium for cultural expression and exchange.

"We were the first people [in Canada] who started setting up electronic bulletin boards systems, e-mail," Solomon says. "We were just kids who were excited, and who were not afraid to change... We rode the tail of the dragon."



Evan Solomon

Although Solomon is no longer directly involved with Shift, he remains passionate and on the pulse about digital culture.

"The revolution is now an evolution," he says. "Ten years ago we didn't know what e-mail was... The digital age is here, and it's becoming ubiquitous. And when it's ubiquitous, you don't realize how involved you are.

"Advanced digital culture is not just what you have in your laptop. It's how we fly our planes, how we drive our cars, how we build buildings, how we design architectural plans."

Television, Solomon adds, is part of the digital culture he speaks of and works within.

"The idea that television is not good for conveying ideas, that it is unable to convey ideas, is wrong... It is my goal to be able to see if television can convey ideas of a more complex nature than a 40-second sound byte.

"Television is young. It's a medium that is only 50 years old. It's a very young palette. People should be experimenting with it all the time."

Solomon's latest Newsworld show, CBC News: Sunday, aims to expand the very concept of television itself. The two-hour show co-hosted by Solomon and Carole MacNeil will air Sunday mornings from 10 a.m. to noon (beginning Feb. 24), and promises to present an "alternative" view.

"We have a critical eye," Solomon says. "We're designed to be able to take a broader and more in depth view than most shows. We're about adding perspective."

The show will include documentary pieces, interviews, out-in-the-field shooting and more traditional news pieces. Contributions from a variety of people will air regularly.

"[The show's] mandate is politics, media, culture, ethics and spirituality," Solomon explains.

"It's a response to the post-Sept. 11 world, where we have to take into account more factors to determine how the world works. If you want to talk about politics, you have to talk about ethics and religion... You have to take into account spirituality because it's central to how you orient yourself in the world.

"Our show is about the line between the personal and the political, where they cross."

Many of the pieces will be "hard- news investigations," with topics ranging from budget politics to lobbying in Ottawa and suicides in Native reserves. Rabbi Gunther Plaut will air in one segment.

"I've been visiting him every month, just to talk," Solomon says. "That's the whole show. He's amazing. I love speaking with him: just to talk to someone about love and the crisis of spirituality – it's wonderful."

Love is a central theme in Solomon's novel, Crossing the Distance, as two brothers struggle with their differences. The novel also questions the nature of television and its implicit effect on society and ourselves, Solomon says.

"What I wanted to do was design the book around the multiplicity of the cultural mindset," he says. "One moment we're very serious and we're watching Osama bin Laden, and we go, 'I can't watch this anymore'– click – and the Simpsons is on, and then we laugh. And then that's over – click – and the news comes on and a bomb goes off in Jerusalem, and you're crying. And then – boom – you switch channels and Seinfeld is on.

"I thought, 'How can people negotiate between these emotional extremes so easily?' We're used to it... So I kind of designed it around this chaotic culture where you go between one state of mind into another."

Solomon describes this emotional channel surfing through a Maimonidean analysis: "This is kind of a Maimonides thing: if I'm not for myself, who am I for? But if I am not for others, what am I? And if not now, when?... It is about finding yourself first. Before you can take action, you've got to find out who you are. In a world of multiplied meanings, you have to decide, make your call."

As Solomon crosses between print and digital media and culture, a strong voice in contemporary Canadian culture emerges, one that we are sure to tune into.

Toronto doctor's autobiography details dark era of restrictive Jewish quotas

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Barnet Berris, born in Toronto in 1921, became the first Jewish doctor appointed to the full-time staff of the University of Toronto's department of medicine in 1951.

In Medicine: My Story, a recent publication of the University of Toronto Press, Berris tells the story of his career. The book elegantly details the changes he observed in medicine during 46 years of practice, and illuminates the history of Jewish doctors in Toronto from the dark era of quotas to the present, when merit is the key criterion for doctors securing a staff position.

Although Berris graduated in the mid-1940s as one of the top 10 students in a class of 126, none of Toronto's teaching hospitals would accept him as an intern. He was the only student from his class who had not been "matched" to an appropriate position.

Through persistence, he was permitted to see the Toronto General Hospital's list of candidates – and was "stunned" by what he saw.

Beneath the Toronto General's list of acceptable candidates, another three names appeared under the heading "Hebrew list." His own name appeared in yet another category called "Alternate Hebrew."

The Toronto Western Hospital's list was even more restrictive, he writes. It contained only one Jewish name, belonging to the gold medalist of the graduating class.

After a year interning at St. Joseph's Hospital and a stint in the army, Berris joined the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis for a three-year residency. Then, with excellent references and credentials, he re-applied to the University of Toronto's department of medicine.

The university-affiliated Toronto General refused him a full-time position but offered a temporary fellowship, perhaps as a means of getting around the unspoken restriction against Jews, Berris writes. But the old cultural barriers were indeed breaking down: he eventually rose to become chief of medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"You might ask why I tacitly accepted overt anti-Semitism from a medical school without taking any action," he writes. "The reason was that in the 1940s, there was no mechanism available to bring about any change in this area.

"Bias against not only Jews, but also other ethnic and minority groups and women, was common. It was difficult to go public, there were no laws prohibiting such activities and minority groups at that time had very little influence, political or otherwise."

Berris writes that the accepted stance among Jews was to keep quiet and not make waves. He tells an old story about two Jews, facing a firing squad, who are asked their final wish. When one requests a cigarette, the other says, "Shh, don't make trouble."

Medicine: My Story details the opening up of the medical community in Toronto over the last half century and is a chronicle of an illuminating and multi-faceted medical career. It is a welcome addition to the historical record of both the Jewish and medical communities.

Copies of are available for $32.99 in the gift shop of the Mount Sinai Hospital. All proceeds go toward the medical research fund of Mount Sinai's department of medicine.

ROM raising funds for neurodegenerative disease

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most programs to raise funds or awareness of health issues are designed for adults – balls, parties, draws, golf tournaments, bazaars.

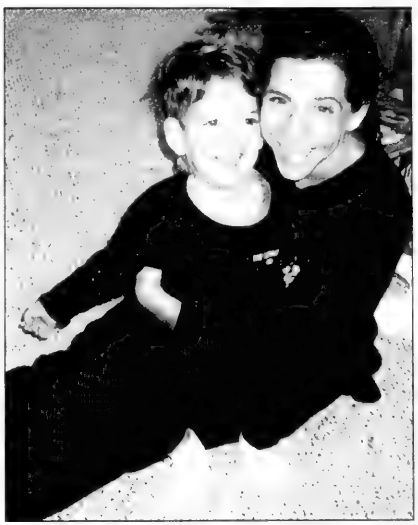
Jacob's Ladder, the Canadian Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease, is taking a different tack.

On Feb. 10, the organization is sponsoring An Adventure with Polkaroo & Jacob's Ladder at the ROM, an all-day event at the Royal Ontario Museum that will feature popular television personality Polkaroo presenting an interactive show in the ROM Theatre, helped by Hidee the Clown; guest entertainers Kayla and her infamous dog Ralph; Al Bowers; clowns Bumbledee and Mel-o-dee; Rylan Firby and face painting.

There will be two treasure hunts – one in the morning and one in the afternoon – around the museum, complete with prizes and loot bags for every child with a ticket.

Admission is $20 for adults and seniors, and $18 for children up to 11. Babies get in for free.

Jeff Schwartz, who is organizing the event with Wendy Peters and Rhonda Wolfond, remembers telling The CJN in an interview last April that it is a good day for him and his wife Ellen if the only bad thing that happens is that they lose their keys.



Jacob and Ellen Schwartz two years ago, before Jacob's symptoms became more severe.

Their son Jacob, 4, has Canavan's disease, a progressive, genetic disorder that affects the production of myelin, which acts as a conductor of signals between the brain and the nervous system, and attacks the brain, spinal cord and nerves.

Jacob cannot speak, has no trunk or head control, and eats through a gastric tube. He no longer smiles. Most likely, he will not see his 10th birthday.

The Schwartzes were tested for Tay-Sachs disease, as many other young couples have been in the city since the early 1970s. Until very recently, however, there was no screening for Canavan's disease in Canada. It was also only very recently that a test was available for familial dysautonomia, another rare genetic disorder.

There are many similarities between Canavan's disease, Tay-Sachs and familial dysautonomia (FD). All three result from a recessive gene, meaning that both parents must carry that gene. All are relatively rare, but catastrophic when they appear. They are most prevalent in Ashkenazi Jews – familial dysautonomia, in fact, has been found only in Ashkenazi Jews.

Tay-Sachs leaves the body unable to metabolise fat in the nerve cells, producing central nervous system degeneration. It is characterized by progressive mental deterioration, blindness, paralysis and epileptic seizures. Death usually occurs between ages three and five.

Familial dysautonomia is a disorder of the autonomic and sensory nervous systems, which are responsible for such basic functions as blood pressure, breathing, swallowing and digestion. Symptoms include difficulty swallowing, poor temperature control, wide swings in blood pressure, vomiting, sweating, decreased or no reaction to pain, and spinal curvature.

The goal right now, Schwartz said, is to foster awareness and create educational programs in the community.

"Screening and prevention are more important than therapy."

While the conditions are indeed rare, one in 30 Ashkenazi Jews carry the gene for FD, a similar percentage for Tay-Sachs, and one in 40 carry the gene for Canavan's disease.

With genetic screening and counselling, a couple may choose to terminate the pregnancy, adopt children rather than have their own, or at least prepare themselves for what they will have to face. If the testing is done during the engagement period, a couple may decide not to marry.

"We want to educate the public, rabbis, schools, universities, even wedding planners on what these diseases are, how people can be tested, and why it is so important that they be tested," Schwartz said.

Canavan's, FD and Tay-Sachs are seen so seldom, compared to other diseases that affect children, that many doctors haven't seen a case, and so don't diagnose it. Schwartz wants to approach them – particularly, he suggested, obstetricians and gynecologists.

Jacob's Ladder is not doing this on its own. Schwartz is pleased that National Tay-Sachs and Allied Diseases of Ontario and Toronto chapter, Ontario branch of the Dysautonomia Foundation are co-operating fully.

"At the moment, we are concentrating on Toronto, but we hope to spread out to Ontario and eventually nationally."

The ROM program typifies the growing community involvement with these rare diseases. Students from CHAT are fulfilling their community service obligations by volunteering at the event. The loot bags and prizes have been donated. An anonymous benefactor has donated a block of tickets to be distributed to Jewish Family & Child Service clients and those from the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health.

"It shows the community working together for a common goal," said Schwartz.

For tickets or more information, call the ROM programs department at 416- 485-5797.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce
The Sixth Annual
Passover Literary Supplement.

We invite the authors and poets among our readers to submit their works. The works must be previously unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction cannot be longer than 1,500 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than Feb. 15, 2002
at The CJN, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205,
Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our seventh annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 21. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 2002. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 8, 2002.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 21, 2002.

CANTOR EDWARD R. FOGEL
Suddenly, on January 8th, 2002, in St. Louis, Missouri, dearly beloved husband of Lynne (Haber), devoted father of Jonathan of St. Louis, and Shira (Marty) Lefkowitz of Portland, Oregon; dearly beloved son of Szoel and Etke Szosenfogel and cherished brother of Benny (Carl) of Toronto, Ontario, and a dear uncle, nephew, cousin and friend. Cantor Fogel was born in Turkestan, Russia in 1943 and raised in Toronto, Ontario. He received his Bachelor's of Sacred Music from Hebrew Union College, New York, in 1970, and he moved to St. Louis to become the first cantor in the 130 year history of the congregation Shaare Emeth. He received his Master's degree in music from the St. Louis Conservatory of Music in 1983. Cantor Fogel was a past-president of the American Conference of Cantors and a founder and past-president of the St. Louis Circle of Jewish Music. Cantor Fogel was a multi-talented musician who was blessed with a magnificent tenor voice that enriched the lives of his congregants and his family. He retired in 1998 and became Cantor Emeritus. Funeral services and internment were held at congregation Shaare Emeth in St. Louis. Shiva was observed in St. Louis and Toronto.

Nazi documents show death camp totals

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Recently released documents that have gathered dust in British archives for more than half a century reveal long-hidden information about the Holocaust, two researchers say.

The researchers' findings appear in the latest edition of the journal Holocaust and Genocide Studies, which is co-published by the Oxford University Press and the Washington-based U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

According to authors Stephen Tyas of England and Peter Witte of Germany, the recently declassified and decoded Nazi radio dispatches show "for the first time" the Nazis' own accounting of the numbers of Jews killed in 1942 in four Nazi camps.

In that year, a total of 1,274,166 Jews were killed in the extermination camps of Belzec, Sobibor and Treblinka, as well as in the Majdanek concentration camp.

The decoded document indicates that 24,733 were killed in Majdanek; 434,508 in Belzec; 101,370 in Sobibor; and 713,555 in Treblinka in 1942.

Tyas and Witte studied two coded messages broadcast from occupied Lublin, Poland, on Jan. 11, 1943.

One message, which was not completely recorded by British intelligence agents, was addressed to a SS Lt. Col. Eichmann in Berlin.

The second message, sent five minutes later by Lublin police leader and SS Maj. Hermann Hoefle to SS Lt. Col. Heim, deputy commander of the SS and the SD in Krakow, Poland, is "much more complete," the authors write.

The documents indicate a lower number of deaths in Belzec for 1942 than previous estimates.

Adding the new Belzec figure to totals for the other camps published in the latest edition of The Holocaust: A Short History by German historian Wolfgang Benz, the result is a total of 1,644,508 Jews killed in the Reinhardt camps and in Majdanek.

One German historian, Wolfgang Scheffler, appears to have come remarkably close to the revised Belzec figure back in 1973, when he gave an estimate of 441,442.

Asked if he thought the revised accounting for murders in Belzec would fuel Holocaust denial, Witte said, "Holocaust deniers have always concentrated on Auschwitz. They never dealt with the Reinhardt camps. They do not exist for them. And there is no doubt that in those camps more were killed all together than in Auschwitz."

Historians generally agree that about 1 million people, mostly Jews, were killed in Auschwitz.

The decoded document indicates the total for the four camps matches a known number from a 1943 report by Richard Korherr, statistician to SS head Heinrich Himmler, Tyas said.

Bubba Berenzweig getting noticed for more than his name

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — His mom can't stand it when people call up and ask for Andy. That's because Mrs. Berenzweig knows her son has been going by his nickname, Bubba, for as long as he can remember.

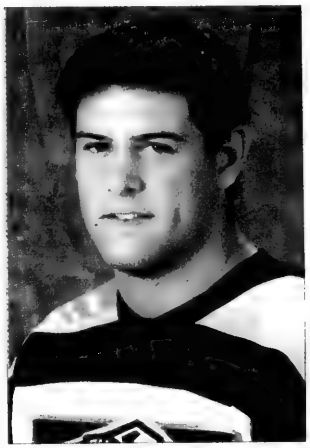
While the 24-year-old rookie defenceman for the Nashville Predators has been attracting attention in the hockey world for his name, the 1996 fifth-round draft pick of the New York Islanders knows it will be his play on the ice that determines whether he has a future in the National Hockey League.

An uncle from Texas gave Berenzweig the nickname when he was two years old because he was a large and rambunctious kid. At age five, his father put it on the back of his hockey helmet and it has stuck with him ever since. Now his mom has gotten so accustomed to it, even she calls her son Bubba.

In 16 games after being recalled from the IHL's Milwaukee Admirals on Dec. 19, the 6-foot-1, 215-pound blueliner saw quite a bit of time on the first power play unit and played solid defence. But he left the ice midway through the first period against the Maple Leafs on Jan. 8 after lacerating his thumb on his skate blade and has been sidelined for more than a week.

"I hope the injury doesn't set me back," said Berenzweig, sporting the cut that required 14 stitches, following the game in Toronto. "I told myself (after being recalled) just to go out and try and do the things that made me successful at every other level. I hope when I do come back, I play as well as I was before I hurt myself."

So far this season, Berenzweig has scored three goals and added four assists. He is even in the plus/minus column.



Acquired in a trade from the Islanders in 1999, Berenzweig started the season in Milwaukee but was called up at the end of October. He scored his first NHL goal in Ottawa on Nov. 12 and saw action in six games, then sat as a healthy scratch for three weeks before being returned to the minors on Dec. 4.

"He just wasn't ready," said Predators coach Barry Trotz. "There were some areas of his game the coaches didn't have confidence in.

"He sort of won us over. I just think every time he comes up he's more comfortable. He's playing with some confidence, he's carrying the puck and his battle skills are much better in terms of playing at this level on a consistent basis."

After a two-week return to the IHL, Berenzweig rejoined the Predators lineup and shortly afterwards was selected to play in February's IHL all-star game.

So far, his development as a defenceman has followed a classic path. In his first season as a professional in 1999-2000, he ranked second among Admiral defencemen and IHL rookies with 27 points (four goals, 23 assists). He led Milwaukee defencemen, and rookies, in playoff scoring with three points (one goal, two assists) and was named the IHL's McKenzie Award winner as the top U.S.-born rookie in the league.

In college, he was captain at the University of Michigan from 1997 to 1999, helping to lead the Wolverines to the 1998 NCAA hockey championship.

A two-time winner (1998-99) of Michigan's Vic Heyliger Trophy as the team's outstanding defenceman, he was named to the Central Collegiate Hockey Association's Second All-Star Team in 1998 and to the 1998 NCAA Championship All-Tournament Team.

Berenzweig grew up in a primarily Jewish neighbourhood in Arlington Heights, Ill. and attended the University of Michigan for four years.

A huge Red Wings fan in those days, he whooped it up with his housemates when Detroit won the Stanley Cup. Ironically, he enjoyed a breakthrough game in late December against the league-leading Wings.

"I couldn't have asked for a better game to do that in," said Berenzweig, who set up two third-period goals in the final five minutes to tie the game, and then scored the overtime winner on Dominik Hasek. "I got pretty wrapped up in that whole (Stanley Cup-winning) scene. It meant a lot that I played that well against that team."

U.S.-born Bubba Berenzweig has made the jump from college hockey to the NHL, with a stop in the International Hockey League, where he is an all-star defenceman. [Photos courtesy Nashville Predators]

Chocolate Blinis w/Berry Caviar

3/4 cup flour	1/4 cup brown sugar
2 tblsp sugar	1/2 tsp instant coffee powder
2 tsp baking powder	1 egg
1/8 tsp salt	1/2 tsp vanilla
8 tblsp (1 stick) unsalted butter	butter, for the skillet
1/4 cup cocoa powder	1 cup whipped cream
1/2 cup milk	1 pint raspberries or blackberries

Mix flour, sugar, baking powder and salt in bowl. Set aside.

Melt butter in small saucepan. Stir in cocoa until smooth. Gradually stir in milk and heat to lukewarm. Off heat, whisk in brown sugar, coffee powder, egg and vanilla, stirring until mixture is smooth. Pour contents of saucepan over flour mixture and stir until dry ingredients are completely moistened.

Heat skillet over low heat until hot and coat pan with butter. Pour 3" pancakes and cook over low heat until bubbles form around edges. Flip and cook until lightly coloured. Crush raspberries or blackberries lightly with fork to resemble caviar. Serve pancakes with whipped cream and berries. Yield: 18-20 3" pancakes.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am a non-observant Jew and I have gone to a secular public school all my life. I have never been active in the Jewish world, except for going to synagogue on High Holy Days. I never really thought about becoming more active or observant until recently. Now, I have suddenly realized that I know little or nothing about Hebrew, the Torah, or anything else. I feel as though Judaism is something I would very much like to bring into my life, but I don't even know how to start. What can I do to get more involved?

Enthusiastic

Dear Enthusiastic,

It's definitely not hard to become more observant or more active in the Jewish community. If you go to synagogue on the High Holy Days, then try going to the same synagogue on Saturday morning for a Shabbat service. You will be pleasantly surprised by how much you can learn from going on a weekly basis, or even from going to a single service. Mark down on your calendar when all the Jewish holidays are and make an effort to go to synagogue, or at least to celebrate it somehow. Also, see if you can get somebody else interested – becoming observant will be more fun and you'll be more likely to stick with it if you're doing it with a friend.

Another good place to go is your local Jewish community centre. Ask about Hebrew language courses, Jewish studies courses or whatever else interests you. These courses are also a great way to meet new people. Hebrew will be difficult to learn if you are not very committed, because it is a language and requires practice, but it can definitely be done. In addition, try to find out about a Jewish course or group that involves discussion. This will give you huge insight and will allow you to understand the complexity of Jewish issues.

Many public schools have some sort of Jewish club or activity council. Find out if your school has something like this. If it does, join it; if it doesn't, start one! When it comes to learning more about the Torah and Jewish traditions, the best thing you can do is research on your own. Look up any facts or traditions you're unsure of or want to know more about in the Torah. This will be difficult at first, and you'll probably need to ask someone for help, but eventually you'll get the hang of it and will be able to look things up more quickly.

Whatever you choose to do, I hope you have found this helpful and that you will learn as much as you want to. Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

New group formed to fight anti-Semitism

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler is leading an effort to attract prominent non-Jews to a new international body that will "sound the alarm" over what he describes as "an exploding new anti-Jewishness" in the world.

The International Commission to Combat Anti-Semitism held its founding meeting in early January in Jerusalem with Cotler, a longtime human rights lawyer, and Per Ahlmark, a former deputy prime minister of Sweden, agreeing to serve as its interim co-chairs. Ahlmark is also European co-chair of UN Watch, a group promoting the fair application of the UN Charter.

Irwin Cotler a leader in the effort

At a press conference announcing the commission's formation, Cotler said the new anti-Semitism hides behind denunciations of Israel and Zionism and is best defined as "the discrimination against, or denial of, the national particularity and peoplehood" of Jews.

"In other words, the singling out of Israel and the Jewish people for differential and discriminatory treatment in the international arena."

Cotler told the commission's founding meeting that this latest form of "the world's longest enduring hatred" is not confined to Israel's enemies, but is increasingly finding legitimacy in international forums, including the United Nations.

The News in Brief

Canada

Cut Ties: Israel

OTTAWA — A top Israeli official has urged Canada to sever all ties to the radical Islamic group Hezbollah. Canada, like the European Union, has listed the military wing of Hezbollah as a terrorist organization, but says the group's political and social wings carry out "humanitarian work." The distinction allows Canadian charities to fund the groups as long as the money is earmarked for social programs in Lebanon and the Palestinian areas. By contrast, the U.S. considers the whole Hezbollah apparatus to be a terrorist organization. Alan Baker, chief legal advisor at Israel's foreign affairs ministry, said last month in an interview with the National Post that Canada should reverse its policy, saying Hezbollah has massed huge amounts of weapons along Israel's northern border. Canada recently cut all ties to Hamas.

Israel

Auschwitz Album

JERUSALEM — Yad Vashem has published an expanded version of the Auschwitz Album, the only surviving visual evidence of the process of mass murder at Auschwitz-Birkenau, on its Web site, (www.yadvashem.org) to coincide with the 57th anniversary of the liberation of the camp (Jan. 27, 1945). The on-line album shows 58 photographs documenting the day-to-day functioning of Auschwitz, taken in early summer 1944 by SS men responsible for the identification and fingerprinting of newly-arrived Hungarian Jews.

New Exits

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are building seven new emergency exits in the Western Wall Plaza. Security forces say the new exits will help evacuate people from the plaza in case of an emergency.

World

Israeli Leader

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement's rabbinic arm is to be headed by an Israeli for the first time. The Rabbinical Assembly, which represents some 1,500 Conservative rabbis in North America, will name Rabbi Reuven Hammer president at its convention this month. Rabbi Hammer is a professor of rabbinic literature at the Schechter Institute for Jewish Studies, the Conservative seminary in Jerusalem.

Boys Charged

PRAGUE — Two 16-year-old boys have been charged with hate crimes after police seized a videotape of young people attacking gravestones at a Jewish cemetery in a Prague suburb last fall. Police said a group of youths filmed themselves damaging more than 50 gravestones, giving Nazi salutes and chanting anti-Jewish slogans.

Holy See Change

VATICAN — The Vatican says the Old Testament validates Jewish waiting for the Messiah. In a document that appears to show a shift in Catholic thinking, the Holy See declared, "The Jewish wait for the Messiah is not in vain." Now part of official church doctrine, the document also calls on Catholics to recognize the "moral value" of the Old Testament. The document reportedly was released last month with little fanfare.

'Day of Judaism'

WARSAW — The Roman Catholic Church in Poland has marked its fifth annual Day of Judaism. The church held a series of events Jan. 17 devoted to commemorating the Holocaust. Catholic officials stressed that anti-Semitic attitudes are against church teachings.

Mass Bar Mitzvah

MOSCOW — Fifty-one boys celebrated their bar mitzvah at a Moscow synagogue last month. The ceremony at the Marina Roscha synagogue celebrated the 51st anniversary of the late Rabbi Menachem Schneerson's assuming the leadership of the Lubavitch movement.

Jews Rally

BUDAPEST — About 2,000 people rallied outside Hungary's parliament on Jan. 17 to mark the anniversary of the 1945 liberation of the Budapest Ghetto. Participants also called for an offensive against anti-Semitism. This was the first time the annual commemoration, usually conducted inside the Dohany Street Synagogue, took place in a public space.

City Redresses Barring of Jews

LONDON — Churches in the city of Derby have presented the Jewish community with $4,300 (US) after rescinding a 700-year-old charter that barred "any Jew or Jewess from ever living" in the city.

Last March, a service officially renouncing the charter was held in Derby Cathedral, and an appeal was made to raise money for a symbolic donation to a Jewish cause.

Officials checked records at the Public Record Office in London, as well as local records in Derby, and found a reference to the charter, which local Christians had underwritten for 10 marks.

The record of the king's revenues for the year 1260 referred specifically to the payment of 10 marks for the charter banning Jews from the city.

The Bank of England was asked how much the sum would be worth today. Calculations produced £2,980, so a cheque for £3,000, equal to $4,300, was made out to Great Britain's Zionist Federation.

WANTED: bone marrow donor

11-month-old Makayla born with rare genetic condition

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What do you do when your grandchild has a life-threatening disease, one that keeps her in a hospital isolation room for months, while a search is made for a bone marrow donor?

If you are North York family physician Brian Sheffield, you try to make sure no other family goes through what you and your family are going through.

Sheffield's granddaughter, Makayla Goodman, now 11 months old, was born with a rare genetic condition, cartilage hair hypoplasia.

This condition is "characterized by short stature, thin wispy hair and a lowered immune response," Sheffield said.

It gets worse. Makayla also suffers from SCIDS, severe combined immune deficiency syndrome. She has no immune response at all. Sheffield said that she is only the third case of this kind in the history of the Hospital for Sick Children.

When she was eight months old, Makayla was admitted to an isolation room at the hospital. "There is a crib, a rocking chair and a mat for her to crawl around on, as she cannot come into contact with the bare floor, for fear of infection," Sheffield said.

Sheffield's daughter, Melissa Goodman, is with her daughter seven days a week, from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., saying that she wants her face to be the first one she sees in the morning, and the last one at night.

Only four caregivers are allowed to spend time with the baby – her parents, Melissa and Ian, and Sheffield and his wife Annette. (The other grandparents, Len and Maryan Goodman, were originally among the four caregivers, but stepped aside when Len had a heart attack. They will not see Makayla until

Dr. Barry Sherman makes major Israel Bonds donation to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.
Value of Gift to Double in Ten Years

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto benefited from a substantial gift that will almost double in value in ten years, thanks to Dr. Barry Sherman and the unique attributes of the State of Israel Bonds Zero Coupon Bond. The Jewish Foundation is UJA Federation's Bequest and Endowment Fund.

"Barry Sherman has done something truly remarkable again," said Neil Nisker, Chair, Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. "This gift is a significant contribution to the future of our Jewish community. It will ensure that we can nurture and cultivate critical social service and cultural programs in Toronto, Israel and around the world."

"State of Israel Bonds plays a key role in supporting the infrastructure in Israel. Also, UJA Federation needs to build its Endowment Fund to secure the future of our local community. By buying Israel Bonds and donating them to UJA Federation's Endowment Fund, we can support both Israel and the future of our local community at the same time," stated Barry Sherman.

"Israel Bonds and The Jewish Foundation—in fact, foundations in general—are a perfect match. All foundations have a place in their investment inventory for long-term bonds. And the donor still gets a tax receipt. You help our community, you help Israel and you help yourself. It's win-win-win," noted Larry Waller, the Executive Vice-President of Israel Bonds.

Failures of responsibility

So much of the news we report contains variations on a constantly recurring theme. For example the theme of responsibility, more specifically, failed responsibility – in one form or another – has been often discussed in the pages of this newspaper. I bring to readers' attention two further illustrations from last week's news

Political responsibility.

The point has often been made that one of the key responsibilities of elected and other public officials is that of example.

They are watched very closely, perhaps too closely sometimes, perhaps even unfairly at times. But how politicians behave in public is very much a legitimate subject for scrutiny and for discussion. That behaviour, willy nilly, becomes the de facto standard for the public and very often an influence that is absorbed osmotically in slow doses, and ultimately emulated, by the younger members of the public.

In that light, therefore, I point out the egregious statement last week by Alberta Premier Ralph Klein regarding doctors.

He and the other premiers of Canada met for two days in Vancouver to discuss strategies for improving the quality of health care across the country. Without the premiers' favourite whipping boy, the federal government, at the conference, it was a rather mild-mannered gathering.

The centerpiece of the conference was Klein's blueprint for health-care reform, the report he commissioned from Don Mazankowski and which he had released to the public some days earlier.

No sentient being in this country will disagree with the proposition that the national health care system needs to be refined to keep pace with the quickly evolving times and nature of Canadian society. There are simply too many stresses and strains that threaten the system all along its seams.

At a press conference, Klein was making the case for a publicly-funded system that could also accommodate more private enterprise, for-profit components. Whether or not one agrees with the premier's plan, there are any number of arguments that he could have marshalled to make the case, not the least of which is that the costs of the system can no longer be borne by taxes alone. The amounts involved are so great and becoming greater each year, that the delivery of other vital public services may soon be threatened.

Instead, Klein, attempted to justify introducing more for-profit components into the health-care system by pointing to the alleged for-profit motives of the key engines driving up the cost of the health care system, namely, the doctors.

"That's why they go to school for many, many years, so their earning power can increase. I mean how do doctors buy their big houses?" Klein said.

The premier may actually have intended to compliment doctors. Who knows? But it was a demeaning and highly regrettable resort to stereotyping, glibly dismissive of the inordinately demanding pressures under which most doctors work and flippantly ignorant of the ultimate, life-or-death nature of the issues that many doctors face every day.

For most doctors, their work is not about money. But Klein has made it seem so. And now many people will simply agree, having an imprimatur for such a shallow belief in the person, no less, of the premier of Alberta himself.

Journalistic responsibility.

Something bad must be happening at the Globe and Mail. Twice in two weeks, they have singled out Israel in their editorials in a way that fails the most rudimentary tests of fairness and honesty.

Two weeks ago, the offensive editorial in question related to the interception by Israel of the ship Karine A laden with 50 tons of arms. Last week the subject was "The Hobeika file."

Eli Hobeika was the former commander of the Christian militia that actually carried out the 1982 slaughter of the Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Beirut. Last week Hobeika was killed by a car bomb.

The day after the murder, the Globe opined in the very first paragraph of its editorial: "There is no shortage of suspects, but dust from the huge explosion had barely settled before a clutch of fingers were pointing at Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon." Fair enough.

But the impression of balance was nothing more than that: an impression, a chimera. The editorialist did indeed identify the other suspects in the murder, but only minimally in the penultimate paragraph of the editorial.

The aim of the editorial was clearly to imply that "the bomb blast was Israel's work designed to silence Mr. Hobeika," a potentially explosive and damaging witness against Sharon in the Sabra and Shatila "human rights" case pending against him in Brussels.

The motive of the editorial is thus transparent. But, alas, so too was its utter disregard for fairness and honesty. For it never once mentions that an anti-Syria, pro-independence, pro-Lebanon group had claimed responsibility for the bombing.

One would think an admission of responsibility, even by a previously unknown group, would not have been a minor detail for the Globe's editorialist speculating so pointedly and mischievously about who killed Eli Hobeika.

CJC seeks redress over Finkelstein interview

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is seeking an on-air apology from Toronto radio station AM 640 over controversial remarks made by a recent guest on one of its shows.

Congress's Ontario region also wants air time to respond to statements made by Norman Finkelstein, an American Jewish professor long known for arguing that Jews and Jewish organizations use the Holocaust to gain money and political power, and as an ideological weapon to further Zionist objectives and justify Israel's treatment of Palestinians.

Failing its request, Congress says it's ready to launch "legal action and/or a formal complaint" to the Canadian Radio, Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC).

CJC is particularly upset that Finkelstein described it and the World Jewish Congress (WJC) as "hucksters, hoodlums and thugs," and is angry the program's host, Andrew Krystal, seemed to egg his guest on.

The matter goes back to Jan. 10, when Finkelstein, author of the recent book The Holocaust Industry: Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering, was a telephone guest on AM 640, also known as "Mojo Radio" and "Talk Radio for Guys."

He was heard on the call-in show Cover Your Ass Prime Time, hosted by Krystal, described on the station's Web site as "a former academic" who "knows his stuff and delivers. Forget spin and political correctness."

Krystal began the show by saying that CJC had been invited to appear with Finkelstein, but declined because it could not "dictate the terms" of the interview.

Among Finkelstein's on-air assertions:

- Of the $13 billion collected in Holocaust reparations and restitution since the end of World War II, only $100 million has gone to survivors, and that Jewish groups have engaged in "blackmail and extortion" in "a complete scam" to get reparations from Germany;
- It's "morally distasteful" of Jews to "rank suffering" by saying they suffered more than anyone during the war, and that the purpose of this "uniqueness claim" is to give Jews "special moral dispensation to marginalize the suffering of others," especially Palestinians;
- There is an "ugly undercurrent" in Jewish thought that "Gypsy life is not as important as Jewish life," and there has been a "determined effort" to exclude the Gypsy experience from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum;
- Groups like CJC and the WJC use the Holocaust "to behave like a gang of hucksters, hoodlums and thugs;" are involved in "a vast shakedown" of Holocaust-era reparations; and ensure that "all dissent is drowned out;"
- Israel uses the Holocaust "to immunize it against criticism."

As always, Finkelstein pointed out that he is Jewish and the son of Holocaust survivors. Krystal referred to Finkelstein as "the most controversial man in the world right now."

In letters to AM 640 station manager Jim Johnston, CJC Ontario region chair Ed Morgan requested an on-air apology from Krystal and the "opportunity to present a balanced perspective on this matter."

CJC wrote that its refusal to appear on the program was based on its policy that "as a matter of principle, [Congress] does not appear on the same podium as individuals whose views are so extreme that appearing in public with them would provide legitimacy to their extremism."

But Congress is mainly upset that Krystal did not confront his guest with more facts or questions.

For example, CJC pointed out to the station, the total amount that has been negotiated and disbursed to Holocaust survivors throughout the world is $47 billion. And after Finkelstein's remarks about CJC, Krystal "helpfully chipped in that people who join anti-hate groups often do so as a cover for their own hate."

In a letter to CJC, Johnston explained that "in trying to present a variety of views, it is not our intent to offend any particular racial or ethnic group. As a broadcaster, we do our best to ensure a balance of views. Such balance is not always achieved during a particular program – often the other side of an issue is presented on other programs dealing with the same issue.

"We are sorry that the program offended you. However, we are of the view that the program, while controversial, did not breach [Canadian broadcasting] codes. Please be assured that we take our responsibilities as a broadcaster very seriously."

Congress also said Krystal failed to question Finkelstein's statement that he was fired from his job as a political science professor at New York's Hunter College, presumably over his controversial views about the Holocaust.

However, a Hunter College spokesperson vehemently denied Finkelstein was terminated, stressing that he quit.

"He was not fired," Maria Terrone told The CJN. "He was asked to teach two classes in subjects he had taught before, and he declined to accept the schedule that was offered to him. It wasn't a schedule he wanted."

Terrone said Finkelstein was an adjunct professor, not one with tenure, and that he was not forced out.

"There was no pressure to get him to quit. The chair [of the department] would not have offered him these courses if he was bowing to any kind of pressure."

A recent report in the Forward said Finkelstein was one of several adjunct professors let go last summer after Hunter's political science department saw its budget cut in half. Finkelstein currently has a one-year appointment to the political science department at DePaul University in Chicago, the Forward reported.

AM 640 station manager Johnston did not return The CJN's calls.

Kochberg takes over as president of USCJ

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Paul Kochberg became president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, earlier this month, friends asked him jokingly whether they should offer congratulations or condolences.

From behind his desk in the north Toronto office where he practices real estate law, Kochberg, 59, is enthusiastic and positive about his new role and the challenges he is taking on. But, kidding aside, Kochberg faces some issues that exceed the scope of normal day-to-day operations.

For starters, Kochberg's ascension to the presidency was delayed by more than two months because of a concern over what might appear to be a conflict of interest, due to his daughter Tamara being the Canadian region's youth director.

That issue has been resolved, said Kochberg, who succeeded Gabe Grushcow. He clarified that Tamara's status has been changed so that he has no direct supervisory jurisdiction over her, although day-to-day work and programming remain the same. In fact, Tamara reports to the New York office, as do other staff professionals, but "traditionally, the regions also have some supervisory input," said Kochberg.

"Morale [among the executive] was not great the last couple of months," he said candidly. "This just took too long to resolve."

Paul Kochberg

A longstanding issue, toward which some progress has been made, is the relationship of synagogues here to the umbrella organization. In December 2000, lay leaders of seven local congregations wrote a letter to Stephen Wolnek, USCJ's international president, outlining concerns such as the methods by which dues are determined and spent, and accountability of leadership.

Meetings between local and New York leadership to resolve the issues are still going on.

"It's moving slowly, but I think it's [been] a positive step forward," said Kochberg, adding that there is still some bridge building to be done. He would also like to strengthen the relationship between the regional structure and member synagogues. Those items are priorities, he said.

Kochberg is a firm believer in the benefits of USCJ membership. A past president and longtime member of Shaar Shalom Congregation, he first got involved with United Synagogue when Tamara became active in the organization's youth arm, United Synagogue Youth (USY), where she served as an international executive vice-president.

"The best benefit [of USCJ membership], traditionally, is USY," said Kochberg, who agreed to stand for president only if he could continue as youth commission co-chair. "That's my nachas. I really get a kick out of it," he said.

"I'm hoping we're going to be able to improve on [USY being the best benefit], so that synagogues and their members can say there's a whole variety of programs."

United Synagogue offers "a massive amount of assistance" to member congregations, he said. The resources, such as educational programs, originate from USCJ's central office in New York, but it's up to the regional office to distribute them, Kochberg explained.

Among his goals for the next two years, Kochberg would like to approach member synagogues in Western Canada, which affiliate with geographically closer American regions, to determine if there is any interest in "a truly Canadian region." (The Canadian region was formed three years ago as the result of a merger between the former Ontario and Eastern Canada regions.)

He would also like to increase the profile of USCJ, promote Israel through the organization (he visited twice last year) and reach out to other Jewish organizations as well as to non-affiliated Conservative synagogues.

Kochberg got his start in Jewish organizations as a teenager in B'nai Brith Youth Organization. He became involved in student politics as an undergraduate student at the University of Toronto, where he enrolled as a mature student before entering law school.

A high-school dropout at 16, he credits his wife Barbara for motivating him to return to school after he worked at a series of dead-end jobs for seven years, and his parents for instilling in him a love of Jewish life and Jewish values. His mother, now 90, still attends synagogue – weather permitting, he said.

Referring to both his own synagogue membership and his involvement in USCJ, Kochberg emphasized how important he feels it is to belong to a larger community. "We face tremendous challenges as a community. We have a better opportunity to deal with these challenges if we're together."

HEARTS OF STONE!

For Jews, this past year has been the most difficult in 50. Filled with bombings, terrorism, shock, sorrow and tears in Israel and New York - perhaps no one has suffered as much as The Schevischurder family in Israel.

They lost five members in the Jerusalem "Sbarro" bombing.

The parents were with 5 of their 8 children when a suicide bomber detonated a knapsack filled with nails and explosives. The mother and two daughters A"H were killed instantly. The father and son A"H lay mortally wounded and died after reciting the Shema Yisrael together. Two young girls aged 8 and 10 were injured, one very seriously.

The 3 brothers not with the family found their sisters in the hospital. Then they came together for the five concurrent funerals which took place on Mount Menuchot in Jerusalem.

The father Mati was a Jewish studies teacher and the mother Tzirel worked with deaf children. They left a small amount of life insurance. The remaining 5 children aged 8 to 21, are destitute and facing a crisis. The youngest girl faces many surgeries and long term therapy.

WON'T YOU PLEASE HELP?

We need every Jew to help these five orphans financially. We can defeat those with hearts of stone. Charitable tax receipts will be issued for donations of $18 and up. Please give generously. In the merit of this mitzva may you and all of Israel be blessed with a year of health, happiness and peace. Thank you.

Few services available for trauma victims in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Trauma treatment in Israel is a seriously underdeveloped field, says the director of the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma, a project of the Temmy and Albert Latner Institute of Herzog Hospital.

Danny Brom

"Israeli psychotherapy is backwards in the sense that cognitive behaviour therapy hardly exists. We have to change the clinical stance in the training of therapists," says Danny Brom.

He was in Toronto recently to speak to fund-raisers and raise and awareness about the centre. He was also going on to New York to give a course to social workers who work with survivors of the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

The situation in New York is different from in Israel, Brom says, "because for them it is something that is quite new. At the moment it is a one-time thing, but there is a lot of anxiety that maybe it will happen again."

Part of the trauma treatment in Israel, he says, is having people "revisit" their memories. "If they want to go back living a normal life, they cannot avoid the places where the trauma occurred."

He recently investigated the type of help available for children suffering from trauma and was surprised to learn how few services there were.

"I was under the illusion that the field was covered but when I began looking for professionals I realized there were very few."

If children are looking for help, he says, they have to get into classical psychotherapy, which focuses on a child's development and his relationships with family.

"Trauma therapy is focused on the assumption that trauma throws you off balance and you have to rewrite your mental math.

"When someone goes through a bombing or a traffic accident, they have to answer all types of questions. How did it happen to me? Will it happen again? We can get people functioning without reviewing their whole development."

There are similar services in Israel, says Brom, but his trauma centre is the only one whose mission is to raise the level of services across the country.

"We are also organizing a trauma coalition of organizations so we can begin to see what resources are available and where the needs are."

A wide range of Israelis are exposed to trauma, he says, from youth injured in the Ben Yehuda mall bombing, to the parents who have lost a child, to the children who witness suicide bombings.

"During the actual event, people tend to know what to do. It is when they get to the hospital or go home and see their family that they have their first emotional outburst. That is the start of the whole process in which they go in and out of traumatic memories," says Brom.

"There is a pendulum of having memories and putting them away. This is similar to what happens when people are traumatized during other suddenly intrusive events such as traffic accidents."

The majority of people, however, come out of the process without needing professional help. "There is a lot of resilience. People need information but they do not always need psychotherapy. They do what they need to do. They do not forget what happens, but they function normally."

Some people, though, get stuck in the process, says Brom. "This often happens to people who have suffered previous trauma. People who respond very strongly to an event are at risk for post-trauma stress."

His centre is overwhelmed with requests for help from survivors of trauma, says Brom.

"We were originally set up to deal with victims of traffic accidents and sexual abuse, but those needs got set aside.

"One of my fears is that if there are fewer terrorist incidents in the next number of months, people will forget about trauma. It is popular now because it is in the spotlight. Our work begins, however, when the spotlight is off.

"During a shivah the spotlight is on the mourners. The second week after a death is the worst week. We do not know when our second week will be."

Brom is looking for funds in order to ensure regular trauma services. "One thing we need is a library of trauma information which must be made available to the public.

"There are a sea of needs. These needs are enormous. We have to train people to get out the information in Israel and on the Internet."

There are a lot of crisis programs in schools, he says, but schools also need help months after the incident. "In one school where a student was killed in a terrorist incident, the class was still visiting his grave weekly, six months later. They clearly cannot let go of the incident. They are preoccupied with it."

Brom says there is an association in Israel for people who have suffered from combat stress for many years, but the Israeli mental health care system has given up on them.

"I would like to start a program for them. These people can be helped."

It is difficult to set up these services, he said, because there is little money available. "This is not a one time fund-raising trip. We need money to keep our services going."

Western governments must now take notice

Earlier this month, after suicide bombers struck in Jerusalem and Haifa, a senior European official visited Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat at PA headquarters. PA cabinet minister Saeb Erekat was also at the meeting. The European official was there, ostensibly, to discuss peace strategies with the Palestinian leader, and in the process, to encourage him in the difficult situation in which he now found himself, stuck in Ramallah, with Israeli tanks parked metres away. To help the European guest better understand Arafat's predicament, Erekat told their guest that the PA leader was not the only one under siege, but so too, was the entire Palestinian people.

Apparently offended by his lieutenant's candid characterization of the situation, Arafat interrupted, "I am not under siege. I am in the middle of a campaign that I will continue until I have obtained victory – even if that means shedding the blood of every Palestinian!"

Not surprisingly, the European was astounded. After the exchange of further pleasantries with his Palestinian host, by then undoubtedly more perfunctory than sincere, he took his leave of the PA leader.

Ze'ev Schiff recently reported on that visit in Ha'aretz. In that unscripted, spontaneous blast of defiance, Arafat revealed what he is at the core, and what he will not change despite the hopes – now dashed – of every Israeli who thought Arafat could lead his people to an accommodation with the Jewish state, and it must be added, despite the hopes too of every Palestinian who also yearns to live in peace in his or her own state.

Rather than recoiling at the mere thought of "shedding the blood of every Palestinian," Arafat celebrates in its possibility. Rather than striving with all his might to avoid "shedding the blood of every Palestinian," the PA leader boasts of it as a viable tactic in pursuit of his ultimate goal.

As of this writing, the third suicide attack in Israel in one week, has just been reported. Again, the attack was in downtown Jerusalem aimed at civilian passersby, walking, shopping, stopping for a bite to eat. One Israeli is known dead; more than 100 were wounded.

The condemnation of the attack by the PA was nothing more than routine public relations, cynical, hypocritical and a total fraud. The very day before, speaking to a large crowd of his people, the leader of the PA repeatedly, emphatically called for holy war against the Jews. Jihad was his message, not reconciliation. Three days before, in Nablus, the PA released a Hamas operative from jail to appease a large throng of Palestinians clamoring for the prisoner's liberty.

Unlike Arafat's governing credo, the leaders of Israel will strive with all their power, to avoid "shedding the blood" of even one Israeli. Every government of every democratic, civilized society – including our own in Canada – would do no less.

Yasser Arafat is leading his people to demise not to independence. Western governments must now take notice and do what they can to prevent this. The lives of so many people are at stake.

Messiah controversy correspondence

I

I am amazed that The CJN would find it appropriate to print "The messiah controversy" (CJN, Jan 17).

To print an essay intimating a comparison between Jews for Jesus and the Lubavitch movement is absurd, perverted and unethical. The Lubavitch movement has been the largest single, most unified and effective force combating Jewish assimilation and raising Jewish awareness and involvement in this country for at least four decades. Any comparison is an abuse of The CJN's important communal responsibility. It is the intellectual equivalent of anti-Semitic and obscene pornography!

Does the editor of The CJN truly believe that the folly of an extreme fringe within the Lubavitch community is the problem that faces the general Jewish community today? Does the editor of The CJN really expect to strengthen our community by printing diatribes of sinat-chinam (wanton hatred and intolerance) against one of the finest Jewish communities this country has?

By publishing this article, The CJN has done our entire community a grave injustice and has seriously besmirched its reputation.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan
Executive Director, Chabad @ Flamingo
Thornhill, Ont.

II

I strongly protest the views in the article "The messiah controversy."

There are much more serious issues in our community to address, such as intermarriage (now at over 50 per cent) and the question of "who is a Jew," which has left things very cloudy.

The fact that no Orthodox rabbi of stature has considered the Lubavitch matter a problem clearly discredits and isolates this attack on Lubavitch and on all Orthodox rabbis.

Yoseph Janowski
Toronto

III

With due respect to the theological arguments about what might happen with Lubavitch and the rest of the Jewish nation, the facts on the ground tell a surprisingly different story.

After eight years of David Berger's campaign have passed, let's compare the directions Lubavitch and Berger are taking. Lubavitch has built numerous shuls, day schools and Torah institutions, and encouraged untold thousands (probably an understatement) to draw closer to Torah observance. Dare I say that they have almost single-handedly revitalized Torah observance in the former Soviet Union, the Far East and other locations around the globe? And they haven't stopped. Surely they are the envy of all Jewish outreach groups.

Indeed, the very Lubavitch rabbis in Toronto accused of being "messianics" have been working feverishly to build another Torah institution, kosher another kitchen, affix another kosher mezuzah, bring another Jew closer to Torah – in short, everything we have come to expect from the Lubavitchers.

During this time, what has Berger done? Where are the shuls he has built? Where are the men he has encouraged to put on tfillin, the women who should now be lighting Shabbat candles? Instead, he has utilized the past eight years to spread the message that we should alienate, God forbid, a portion of the Jewish nation from Torah and its commandments.

Who, then, is really following in the footsteps of the false messianic movements?

I think the facts clearly show that Berger and his supporters are the real danger.

E. Serebryanski
Thornhill, Ont.

IV

I believe that the answer to the allegations levelled against the Lubavitch movement lies ironically in the second half of Berger's book's title, "the scandal of Orthodox indifference." Don't you think that there must be a good reason why such an eloquent fellow as Berger, after so many years of crusading against Lubavitch, could not successfully influence the Orthodox community? The answer is simple. The Orthodox rabbinate simply can't be bothered with controlling an irrelevant fringe group of Lubavitch messianists. They don't see it as a priority or as a defining issue compared to the burning, current and colossal issues facing the Jewish community like assimilation, intermarriages and continuity.

Furthermore, the Orthodox know Halachah at least as well as Berger. While they are uncomfortable with fringe Lubavitch messianism (as are many other Lubavitchers), they will not go as far as to establish it as heresy. They know that while it might be based on minority opinions or obscure sources, it is still within the framework of legitimate Halachah.

Finally, they know that the serious leadership of Lubavitch in New York and Toronto and most of the emissaries of the Rebbe around the world, are from the severest critics of the messianist group.

I would also like to express my disappointment with The CJN. It was unbecoming of your otherwise professional paper. Es past nisht! Shame on you!

Rabbi Avraham E. Plotkin
Spiritual Leader, Executive Director
Chabad Lubavitch of Markham

The Messiah controversy: another view

By J. IMMANUEL SCHOCHET

Prof. David Berger's new publication, The Rebbe, the Messiah, and the Scandal of Orthodox Indifference (reviewed in CJN, Jan. 17), is the most controversial book in the Jewish community in recent times. It presents an unprecedented attack on one of the most prominent Jewish religious movements, Chabad-Lubavitch, charging it with distorting and destroying traditional Judaism.

Controversy is guaranteed by emotive arguments that use scary terminology, such as "heresy, idolatry, and adoption of Christian doctrines," which are excellent for promoting sales, but camouflage the real issues. Such language tends to enhance stereotypes and becomes the wrestling mat for preconceived notions. I hardly need disclose that I identify with Chabad. My distress with the book, however, rests on the substantive matters of the author's premises and arguments, rather than on ideology. His methodology is profoundly disturbing, careless and reckless.

Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet

The basic issue is the belief of a number of Lubavitch Chassidim that their Rebbe is the long-awaited Mashiach. They clung to this belief even after the Rebbe's passing in 1994, claiming that in due time the Rebbe would be resurrected and redeem Israel. Berger regards this as a crude violation of Jewish tradition, an import from Christianity and affirming its doctrines. He refers to medieval debates with Christians when the Jewish side argued that the Christian saviour died before accomplishing any messianic prophecies, and dismissed the notion of a "second coming" with a "second chance" as totally unfounded. In Berger's view, this is the fundamental reason for our rejection of the Christian messiah.

Berger then charges that this first offense led to ultimate heresy: "A significant segment of this movement now declares openly that the Rebbe is not only the Messiah but G-d," and that this belief "has entered mainstream Lubavitch." Throughout the book he ascribes the perceived anomalies, perversions and heresies to "large segments," "substantial majority" and "mainstream" of Lubavitch.

Berger provides no evidence whatsoever for his estimates. Occasionally he refers to the notoriously exaggerated or invented reports published in a magazine Beis Moshiach, the organ of the messianists' faction. It is certainly strange that he would rely on a magazine that he rightly accuses of publishing obscene and heretical materials. On the other hand, the formal leadership of Lubavitch appointed by the late Rebbe himself, such as Agudas Chasidei Chabad, and Vaad Rabonei Lubavitch, which he admits to be decidedly anti-messianist, is downplayed as insignificant and of "minimal influence."

In one instance, he concedes, "Statistical precision is elusive, dependent partly on the reading of minds." In another instance, he claims, "The percentage of Chassidim who affirm [anomalies] is secondary." Yet he persists in offering categorical numbers. Thus we must conclude that either he is able to read minds or, more likely, he invents numbers to produce an ad hominem case.

No less disturbing is the author's reference to, and reliance on, an abundance of anecdotal material and critical attributions safely hidden behind a cloak of anonymity. Source-material of this kind surely has no place in a serious study. It is devoid of any legal and moral value.

Part of the book's title is based on Berger's failure and frustration in gaining support from the leaders of Orthodoxy for his quixotic crusade. The only exception to this, he notes, is the endorsement received from the Satmar Chassidim, followers of the late Rabbi Schach from Israel, Rabbi Chaim Keller from Chicago and Rabbi Shmuel Y. Weinberg from Baltimore. Berger acknowledges that the Satmar support is suspect because of its long-standing feud with Lubavitch on issues of ideology.

He fails to mention, though, that the support from the rabbis mentioned is even more suspect. Their antagonism to Lubavitch, and Chassidism in general, marked by extremely offensive statements, dates from well before messianism became an issue. Their mind-set goes back 200 years, to the original feud between mitnagdim and Chassidim, and would seem to be a desperate attempt to revive it. Rabbi Weinberg's comment, quoted several times within the book and on its jacket, is a typical sample of his repertoire going back as far as the 1950s.

Berger himself quotes "heads of non-chassidic yeshivahs" who shrugged off some of his material "on the grounds that Chassidism in general is idolatry." He dismisses this comment by stating his personal belief that most likely this was not meant literally. From my close familiarity with the Lithuanian yeshiva world, which happens to be my very own root and source of origin, I know firsthand that he is wrong.

As regards the idea of Mashiach arising from the dead, there are explicit sources to support this in the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds, the Midrash Rabba and the Zohar. Berger glibly dismisses these as "a rejected position." In his view, "Even a great rabbi's statement cannot automatically legitimate a theological position against the weight of overwhelming contrary opinion." The author thus negates a basic principle of halachic methodology that in matters of conflicting opinions that do not affect actual practice, one cannot reject one or the other to say who is right or wrong.

The author's major concern is that by accepting the possibility of a resurrected messiah, "one of the defining characteristics of Judaism in a Christian world will have been erased." He builds his case on the polemical debates of medieval times, where the idea of a "second coming" of the Christian messiah was rejected. Thus he commits three fatal errors:

- Judaism is defined by its own tradition, and not by its differences from Christianity or other religions.
- Polemical debates have no authoritative or halachic standing. The rabbis of the Talmud engaged in these as well, and often stated that they rebuffed their opponents with "straw" or "broken reeds," that is, that their responses were polemical tactics.
- Judaism rejected the Christian messiah a priori, already in his lifetime, because he lacked the biblical prerequisites of Mashiach, and not simply because he died without redeeming the world.

Berger's appeal to the fact that Christian missionaries now use the messianists' argument to vindicate their belief in a "second coming" is a total non sequitur. For centuries, to this day, they cited authentic Jewish sources from Talmud, Midrashim, Zohar, Jewish Bible commentaries and other texts, to do the same. Are we now to erase these quotations from our heritage?

The book is filled with numerous other errors and fallacies, too many to deal with here. Least among these are careless or mischievous inaccuracies and misinterpretations. For example, Lubavitch is accused of constructing menorahs of an atypical sort "because every new religion needs a symbol," when that "atypical sort" is the shape prescribed by Maimonides.

Is everything "a-okay" in Lubavitch? To my regret, I must answer in the negative. This should not be surprising. Without a singular authority accepted by all, and living in an open society, it is impossible to control or discipline everyone in a community or movement with tens of thousands of families. There are no membership cards to prevent anyone arbitrarily calling himself a legitimate part of that community.

Thus there are divisive factions who insist on an "in-your-face" propagation of the Rebbe as Mashiach, counter to the Rebbe's own explicit instructions. Their numbers are debatable, but they are certainly not the majority or mainstream of Lubavitch. There is nothing halachically wrong about their belief per se. It is, however, a personal belief that is crudely distorted into a categorical doctrine to be accepted by all.

To be sure, this arrogant triumphalism is a phenomenon not unique to Lubavitch. It hardly differs from the arrogant triumphalism in the non-chassidic yeshiva world where rabbis or rosh yeshivas are propagated as the ultimate authority and oracle for all of Israel. This is a universal psychological frailty that I call the "Snow White syndrome," where you look into the mirror, see yourself, and ask, "Mirror mirror on the wall, who is the greatest of them all?"

It is also true that there have been extremely shocking phenomena. Five years ago, Beis Moshiach published an article with idolatrous content, and other articles have appeared there which border upon red lines. These individuals, however, are at most one or two handfuls, and universally denounced (including by the messianists) as a "lunatic fringe" of no consequence, and by now silenced. To condemn the whole movement on their account, and to devote half the book to their aberrations, as if that were the norm, is unconscionable.

Followers of the Rebbe weep as the coffin in which he was carried passed by.

The late Rav. Aaron Soloveichik, a universally recognized halachic authority, stated that the messianist belief in a resurrected Mashiach is "foolishness, but not heretical." Defamation, vilification and calumny is not just foolishness, but tantamount to a compound of "murder, idolatry and incest." It is surely sad and tragic that an otherwise talented academic like Berger confused his targets.

Opinions

Charles' Birthright

Some 20 years ago when it was my privilege to be president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, I had the good fortune to count Charles Bronfman amongst my officers. He was then not widely known, but as I watched him at our meetings, it became evident that here was someone of unusual quality, perception, and with the willingness to do important work. Today, of course, he is one of the best-known Jews in the world, the one who is the catalyst of Birthright Isfael, which so far has sent 22,000 young Jewish people on their first educational trip to Israel.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Recently I received a little pamphlet about Birthright Israel authored by Bronfman, and in it he proposes a new approach to Jewish communal organization. His criticism is directed at the fact that, in all too many instances, philanthropic enterprises are run by older people who hesitate to pass the baton to a younger crowd.

Here are some of the thoughts that Charles conveys in his little pamphlet, and I quote him in his own words:

"Somehow, we have to change the perception that is out there, that rich, old guys who write big cheques – guys even older than me – are the only ones who count. Because there are young men and women who may or may not write big cheques, but who may have a wealth of ideas. They may even have a desire to become more involved with the Jewish community. Will we give them the opportunity to lead?

"And let me ask this: if a person in his or her 20s or 30s can lead a major corporation, why can't she or he run a federation project, or an agency, or indeed a federation?"

That, incidentally, is one of the reasons why I have stayed away from participating in communal activities. I do answer the occasional call, but I think that the day-by-day work has to be done by, and should be left to, younger people. They have ideas that have never occurred to me, and their experience is not ballasted by some of the prejudices which are my own.

This is not false modesty, but rather a recognition that the vitality of our communities depends on the entrance and active participation of a new generation. It does not mean that we, the older ones, have done badly – on the contrary, especially in Canada, we have done extraordinarily well. But we want to be sure that tomorrow will be even better, and I, for one, have the confidence that leaving the future more quickly to younger people with new ideas, new vision and new energy will achieve the kind of goal we hope for more quickly and effectively.

Snow job in Jerusalem

There's nothing like the prospect of snow to get Jerusalem buzzing and people's minds off the weightier issues of the day. Earlier this month, the country's meteorological service announced that a winter storm would hit Israel in a few days.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The country was divided into two main groups – those living in places high enough to get snow and those out of range. The weather folks were quite specific, saying that hilly areas in the north and other locations at least 800 metres above sea level were in for some serious white stuff. Translated locally, this means anything more than light flurries. Jerusalem joined the Golan Heights and the Upper Galilee in the winner's circle of those likely to get snow.

As the storm approached from Europe, much of the country went into a tizzy. Judging from the media coverage, the expected snow quickly became a "major story" – even if it was still no sure thing. In Jerusalem, the sense of anticipation was so intense one would have thought the capital had not seen snow in decades. Snow was all the rage and not a flake had fallen.

Weather was the talk of the town. Would there be school or not? Would companies and government agencies open for business? And if so, how would employees get to work and back home if the streets were blocked? Would a snowstorm bring a temporary lull in Palestinian violence? Free of worry, the city's children knew that at the first sight of even a few frosty flakes, local school boards would cancel classes.

Admittedly, snow is not common in Israel, except on Mount Hermon. In Tel Aviv, it is virtually unheard of. In Jerusalem, there's a snowstorm once every few years and each time residents react as if it were an historic event.

With the countdown underway, TV newscasts showed footage of Greece and Turkey covered in white, proof positive the storm was close to Israel and of the need for contingency plans. Newspapers ran ads listing where, in case of snow, subscribers could pick up their copies. The Israel Electric Company published notices that it was prepared for the storm but included an emergency phone number. On the news, Jerusalem municipal officials readied some 70 snow-clearing tractors as if for a major military operation. The city was on a virtual war footing.

On Sunday, local authorities and the meteorological service warned the public that the snow would finally hit overnight but that emergency measures would keep the city moving. School board officials announced classes might be cancelled depending on road conditions. Children went to bed hoping to wake up to a winter paradise without school, while many adults looked forward to a bonus day off.

On Monday morning Jerusalem awoke to extremely cold temperatures and howling winds, but, disappointedly, not a trace of snow – meaning it was school and business as usual. Like many Jerusalemites, my children felt cheated by the weather man.

That afternoon, just after classes finished for the day, snow finally began to fall and – even better – it was sticking to the ground. Stores and offices closed early, as people feared they would be stranded at work. The entire city turned into a monster traffic jam. By dinnertime, Jerusalem was carpeted in white with the snow still falling and dominating the evening news. All signs pointed to a heavy snowfall and the cancellation of normal life the next day. But it was not to be. Despite the high hopes and advance billing, the snow subsided by late evening and by morning the roads were all open. Many residents, especially the younger ones, felt robbed.

Two days later, a similar scenario unfolded, but in the end rain erased the snow that had fallen earlier in the evening. Despite the disappointment for some, the weather frenzy made for a refreshing change to the recent reality. Capturing the headlines were the forces of nature instead of the forces of evil (read: Palestinian terrorism). It was a welcome, almost festive relief, even if everyone knew it was only temporary. Alas, a few days later, the nation was back to mourning victims murdered in fresh terror attacks.

Changing facts to fit the prejudice

The evidence from the crime scene could not have been clearer – over 50 tons of deadly weapons and explosives, packed in Iranian containers,were displayed at the port of Eilat.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The crew of the Karine-A, from the Palestinian Authority's navy, were caught red-handed, and the jovial captain spoke quite freely about his mission. Israeli intelligence provided the names of the members of Arafat's inner circle who organized the details and signed the cheques.

Given this overwhelming evidence, why did the "international community" take so long to understand its significance? What factors explain the delay between the ship's capture and the beginning of media coverage? Even the U.S. government, which has the greatest understanding of Arafat's strategy of terrorism and violence, hesitated for many days before blaming the Palestinians. The BBC, which often defines the "conventional wisdom" for the Arabist lobby, kept insisting the weapons ship was bound for Lebanon. (This was a textbook example of subjective presentation of "the news.")

Beyond the orientalist sympathy for Arab victimization, European post-colonial guilt and other factors, the psychological phenomena known as "cognitive dissonance" played an important role in protecting Arafat. Among academics, this disease is known to result from the tendency to cling to explanations and conceptions long after these structures have lost coherence. Cognitive dissonance occurs when information is filtered in a manner designed to fit a pre-conception, and distorted to avoid contradictions that would weaken this framework. In other words, when the facts do not fit the biases and mental images, the lazy way out is to ignore the facts, rather than to alter the conventional wisdom.

As a result of this defensive mental process and the conception of invincibility, Israel ignored the signs that the Arabs were planning to attack on Yom Kippur in 1973. Similarly, and more recently, the U.S. government misread all the indications of Osama bin Laden's plans to hijack airplanes to attack major buildings.

In the case of the Arab-Israeli conflict, beginning in 1967, the dominant conception in the world has been one of a powerful Israel oppressing weak Palestinian "victims." Arafat was embraced by the "politically correct" liberal establishment, while Israel, and Ariel Sharon in particular, was demonized. Whenever the Palestinians launched a terrorist attack, they were excused, while Israel's efforts to defend its citizens were distorted and condemned. Many Israelis and Jews in the Diaspora adopted this mental construct, accepting blame in order to avoid the tension and stress inherent in holding views that were different from the dominant model.

As a result, Arafat's actions in violation of the Oslo agreements – including the development of a terrorist infrastructure and the large-scale smuggling of illegal weapons – have been ignored for many years. After Arafat walked out of the Camp David talks in July 2000 and rejected all efforts to negotiate a "permanent status agreement," the power of cognitive dissonance led to instant revisionism.

The media and diplomatic community, including Canada's, quickly grasped onto articles that put the blame on Israel and then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak. An unknown and low-level White House aide by the name of Robert Malley became a sudden media star when he published a series of articles that acquitted Arafat and held Israel responsible for killing the "peace process." Malley could not make his case based on the evidence, but he found a pliant audience that eagerly accepted his analysis, because it allowed them to keep their prejudices intact.

However, as the stress becomes unbearable, the conventional wisdom resulting from cognitive dissonance eventually crumbles, particularly in the aftermath of a catastrophic event.

The events of Sept. 11 forced the United States to rethink its entire security policy. While it is still too early to be sure, the capture of the Karine-A, and Arafat's clear involvement in this massive effort to smuggle illegal weapons and explosives, may also be a breaking point. The images of the deadly missiles displayed on the dock have finally begun to sink in, and, as a result, Arafat is stuck in Ramallah, without visitors or support.

The Kirshner File

Brazilian jeweller discovered lucrative niche

Connoisseurs of fine jewelry the world over are familiar with the striking Gothic logo "H. Stern." In duty-free airport shops, at five-star hotels and in posh neighbourhoods in 14 countries from Brazil and the United States to Israel and Argentina, the Stern chain is synonymous with elegant jewelry.

Sheldon Kirshner in Brazil

Based in Rio de Janeiro, a few short blocks from Ipanema's sparkling beaches and procession of five-star hotels, H. Stern is by far Brazil's largest jewelry enterprise.

It is housed in a 17-storey, 14,000 square-metre building containing showrooms, workshops, labs and a museum exhibiting rough crystals and gemstones. These precious stones are the key to Hans Stern's empire, anchored in 175 outlets.

Now 79, and the patriarch of the company, Stern is one of Brazil's wealthiest tycoons. He had the foresight to realize that coloured Brazilian gemstones – aquamarines, topazes, tourmalines, amethysts, citrines and tanzanites – could compete successfully with Asian precious stones like emeralds, sapphires and rubies.

Before Stern appeared on the scene, snobbish Brazilians sneered at locally-mined gemstones, considering them too common for their supposedly exalted tastes.

Working with newly-arrived European cutters and goldsmiths, Stern blended these under-appreciated gemstones with gold and silver rings, necklaces and brooches. From day one, Stern's impeccable creations were distinguished by originality of design.

H. Stern world headquaraters in Rio's Ipanema district

Several years after starting H. Stern in a modest workshop in downtown Rio, Stern was off and running. Being a private firm, H. Stern does not publish vital statistics like annual sales figures or profits. But H. Stern, he allowed in a recent interview, ranks just behind the big three: Cartier, Tiffany and Bulgari.

When you think of it, this is really amazing.

Stern, a German Jew from the Ruhr Valley city of Essen, immigrated to Brazil in 1939, about six months prior to the outbreak of World War II, with barely a penny in his pocket. Had he stayed in Nazi Germany, he might have met the same fate as his cousins and uncles: death by starvation or murder in a concentration camp.

Instead, thanks to an uncle who had already settled in Rio, Stern and his parents were able to make new lives for themselves in Brazil.

In person, Stern, a trim, somewhat diminutive man neatly attired in a charcoal gray suit, pale blue shirt, blue tie speckled with red dots and black shoes, conveys an aura of openness and friendliness.

Being accustomed to the glare of publicity, he is media-wise, but not slick. Eschewing all jewelry but cufflinks, he strikes a visitor as a down-to-earth, unpretentious person. Fluent in English, he speaks four other languages, including Portuguese and German.

Shortly after the Sterns landed in Brazil, his father, Kurt, an electrical engineer, began managing a power station in Parnaiba, in the northeastern state of Piaui. He and his mother chose to remain in Rio, then Brazil's capital.

Having finished high school in Rio, Stern started working as a typist for Cristab, a small minerals and precious stones exporter. Within two years, he rose to manager.

Being ferociously ambitious, he became a prospector and broker, buying and selling precious stones. His travels, sometimes on horseback, took him to the untamed interior of the state of Minas Gerais. He slept outdoors, and once awoke next to an alligator.

In 1945, he established his own business from the sale of an old accordion and a bank loan obtained with hardly any collateral. His good reputation had preceded him: he was known as someone who paid debts promptly.

In those days, Brazilians usually spoke derisively about coloured stones, dismissing them as merely semi-precious. Stern disagreed with their assessment.

As he likes to say, "Semi-precious stones do not exist, nor do semi-pregnant women or semi-honest men."

Stern's breakthrough came in 1951, when the president of a Latin American country ordered a necklace studded with aquamarines, which appear in more than 35 shades of blue. With this sale, he laid the foundation of a company that has elevated the manufacture and distribution of coloured gemstones into an art.

H.Stern

"I was very lucky," he said. "Things developed."

An innovative entrepreneur, Stern introduced a vertically integrated production and sales system to Brazil's jewelry business. It covers all phases, from prospecting and financing to cutting and retailing.

Hans Stern

Employing 3,500 workers, of whom 2,900 are in Brazil, Stern has an ensemble of 90 shops in Brazil, from Rio and Recife to Belo Horizonte and Sao Paulo (where he maintains another workshop). His flagship store in Ipanema is on 490 Rua Visconde de Piraja.

There are also H. Stern stores in New York City, Miami, Houston, Atlanta, Paris, Lisbon, Bogota, Cartagena, Caracas, Buenos Aires, Lima, Mexico City, Cancun, Santiago and St. Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands.

There are no stores in Canada. "You can't be everywhere," he said, noting that his "biggest operation" outside Brazil is in Israel.

H. Stern has 35 shops in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Lod and Eilat. "That's coincidental," he claimed, referring to the large number of Israeli outlets. "We started in airports, then hotels, and now we're in the local market."

Although he no longer maintains stores in Frankfurt and Dusseldorf, having pulled out for "technical reasons," he keeps an office in Germany to provide after-sales service to buyers. As a tour of his Ipanema showroom indicated, a good many of his customers are Germans. Sixty-three years after leaving Essen, Stern has mixed feelings about Germany.

On average, H. Stern, with an inventory of 300,000 pieces, turns out 20,000 new items a month, from charms to watches. Ninety percent of his jewelry is produced in-house. "Some things, like chains, are farmed out," explained Stern, whose wife, Ruth, is not partial to jewelry. He approves each and every design. Six to eight months elapse from the design to the production process.

A great deal of his clients are tourists, some of whom are famous. Stern has had the pleasure of hosting sovereigns (King Juan Carlos and Queen Sofia of Spain), statesmen and politicians (Henry Kissinger and Robert Kennedy), financiers (Baron Guy de Rothschild), film stars (Charlton Heston, Ginger Rogers, Liv Ullmann, Rock Hudson, Omar Sharif), musicians (Zubin Mehta and Duke Ellington), writers (Albert Camus and Gabriel Garcia Marquez) and dignitaries (astronaut Neil Armstrong and Nobel Prize laureate Linus Pauling).

When he turned 75, Stern handed over the reins to his sons, Roberto, 42, and Reynaldo, 40. Roberto, his designated successor, lives in Brazil, and oversees design and marketing. Reynaldo, based in New York City, is in charge of the overseas market.

"I can be very proud," he mused. "In my lifetime, I have been able to hand over my business to a new generation, my sons. They sometimes listen to my advice." (Stern's third son is an engineer. His fourth is a resturateur).

Although officially retired, Stern is still a powerful presence at H. Stern. He has, however, made a concession to the march of time. "Instead of getting to the office at 8," he chuckled indulgently, "I arrive at 8:30, and leave at 6."

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210.

The passion for politics

The Life: The Seductive Call of Politics*, by Steve Paikin, Penguin Books, 2001.

Among my minor claims to fame is that a long time ago I officiated at the bar mitzvah of Steve Paikin. Born and bred in Hamilton, he has over the past 20 years been an astute political journalist, as well as popular co-host of TVOntario's current affairs program, Studio 2.

For The Life, he interviewed a clutch of politicians to discover why they were attracted to public service. Certainly, the low estimate of politicians generally must have been a drawback.

Machiavelli, as far back as the 16th century, concluded, "Deceit, hypocrisy and perjury are necessary and excusable for the sake of holding on to political power." In our own time Ronald Reagan decided, "Politics is supposed to be the second oldest profession. I've come to realize that it bears a close resemblance to the first." George Bernard Shaw was dismissive of the politician. "He knows nothing, he thinks he knows everything – that clearly points to a political career."

Yet, some men and women – intelligent, unselfish, beneficent – are drawn to the world of politics like drunks to free booze. They are willing to invite public scrutiny, court exhaustion, suffer insult and obloquy and often endanger their marriages and lose their friends.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The politicians Paikin interviewed included Kim Campbell, Frances Lankin, Brian Mulroney, William Davis, Peter Lougheed, David Peterson, Audrey McLaughlin, Lewis MacKenzie, Tom Long, Sharon Carstairs, David Smith, Glen Murray and many others.

The answers they provide for entering the uncertain world of politics are diverse. Some are crusaders, eager to make necessary changes in society. Some are idealists who enjoy the role of pioneers who blaze new trails. Some entered the work unexpectedly and by accident. And for some, of course, there was the allure of power.

William Davis, premier of Ontario from 1971 to 1985 confessed that the private sector didn't compare to the excitement of public life. "There's nothing quite like the sense of accomplishment, the sense of frustration, the sense you may be playing some limited role in the province or the country, and the little things you can do for people."

Along the way, the author reminds us of Herb Gray's long and successful career. He won his first election for the Liberals in 1962 and seven years later became the first Jewish Canadian to sit at the federal cabinet table. Eventually, he became Chretien's deputy prime minister in 1997.

David Croll, one-time mayor of Windsor, was the first Jewish cabinet minister in Canadian society, having served on Ontario Premier Mitch Hepburn's executive council in the 1930's.

The Life is filled with memorable stories and anecdotes that give verve and continual movement and interest to the book.

Paikin, at the end of the trail, confesses that he met politicians who were corrupt, ignorant and incompetent, but, also many who were inspiring. "One can't help but admire them and when they get things done they can change our lives."

Perhaps there is an important message for us in the words of former U.S. Supreme Court justice Felix Frankfurter: "One of the shallowest of disdains is to sneer against the professional politician."

How should teachers portray biblical figures?

By ELLIOT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

How to portray biblical figures is a regular concern of Tanach teachers everywhere. Caught between the desire to preserve the status of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca as worthy of emulation and reverence, and the textual evidence of their periodically less than laudable behaviour, the teacher is caught in the horns of a considerable dilemma.

If the patriarchs and matriarchs are to be worthy of respect, then how can this be reconciled with their seeming flaunting of basic moral rules? Incidents like Jacob's deceitful acquisition of his brother Esau's blessings, or the brothers of Joseph cruelly forcing him into a pit and then selling him off to a foreign caravan are but a few of the passages that come to mind in the unflinching lens that Genesis applies to many of its inhabitants.

These honest portrayals are praiseworthy in one sense and perhaps constitute one of the great glories of the Hebrew Bible, as Erich Auerbach and others long ago proclaimed. But it does leave the teacher in an awkward place. How can one defend such acts? And if one concedes that this kind of activity is one that would be condemnable in one's own children, then is the subsequent damage to the reputation of the forefathers and foremothers almost irreparable?

Jewish tradition has long wrestled with these problems in an open and vigorous fashion. One of the more famous debates concerns Abraham's decision in Chapter 12 of Genesis, where he urges his very attractive wife Sarah to announce upon their arrival in Egypt that she is his sister. Abraham fears he will be murdered by the Egyptians when they find out that Sarah is his wife.

What kind of ethical values are being upheld here? Lie at the first sign of trepidation? Risk your wife's virtue to save your own skin? No less a commentator than the Ramban, the famous 13th-century Spanish exegete, asserts that Abraham "unintentionally committed a great sin by bringing his righteous wife to a stumbling-block of sin on account of his fear for his life. He should have trusted that God would save him and his wife."

Six hundred years later, this criticism inspired the perplexity and counterattack of Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, the leader of German neo-Orthodoxy and author of his own formidable commentary on Chumash. But prior to his defence of Abraham in this specific situation, Rabbi Hirsch writes these memorable words: "The Torah never presents our great men as being perfect, it deifies no man... We are never to say: This must be right for did not so-and-so do it! The Torah is no 'collection of examples of saints.' It relates what occurred not because it was exemplary but because it did occur."

Jewish tradition sometimes oddly vacillates between almost hagiographic boosterism of our ancestors and forthright and detailed criticism. But greatness, as Rabbi Hirsch states, does not mean perfection. When human beings are depicted without flaws, they do not inspire, they simply vanish from reality. Larger than life, they become practically unusable as moral paradigms. Brought into the proper perspective they can serve as signposts along the way to God, for that which is virtuous and that which, alas, is all too human.

Bar/bat mitzvahs – part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I conclude my look at bar and bat mitzvah sites on the Internet with a focus on the very different ways some people celebrate this special day.

The sites that I've visited suggest that there is a general decline in the excess associated with some bar and bat mitzvah celebrations. But you wouldn't know it when you read the article "Bash mitzvahs!" from New York Magazine [http://www.newyorkmag.com/page.cfm?page_id=2343]. The article was written in 1998 during the stock-market boom and it catalogues quarter-million-dollar, multimedia, themed extravaganzas. Were you thinking of doing something different and booking Natalie Cole for your simchah? Well, it's been done. Natalie has already done a bar mitzvah on the aircraft carrier Intrepid. Her fee: $150,000 for 30 minutes.

At the other end of the scale, there are many sites that emphasize how this coming of age is a perfect time to remember others. In "Putting the mitzvah back in bar/bat mitzvahs," several people tell of their genuine mitzvahs. Alexandra Alper collected close to 900 toiletries from neighbours, dentists, supermarkets and others which she donated to a shelter for women. Alison Stieglitz decided that instead of having expensive flower arrangements on each table, she would have baskets of food that would be donated to a local charity [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/340.html]. You can find some more suggestions at the Mitzvah99 B'nai Mitzvah page [http://members.aol.com/mitzvah99/mypage/].

One popular way to celebrate a bar or bat mitzvah is through a family visit to Israel. The Jerusalem Post reports that last year, over 2,000 preteens came to Israel to celebrate their special day – 94 per cent of them from the United States or Canada. Travel planners are becoming quite sophisticated and are offering extended trips with adventures such as a "fabulous bat mitzvah jeep ride" through the dried riverbeds of the Negev desert. However, the most popular spots for the actual bat or bar mitzvah ceremony remain quite traditional: Jerusalem and Masada [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/05/03/Features/Features.25568.html].

After the festivities are over, all that remains are the memories and the videos and the thick photo albums. You can compare how times have (or haven't) changed when you look at snapshots from Detroit's b'nai mitzvah family album [http://www.mjoe.org/album/index.html]. (No, your eyes aren't playing tricks on you. People really did use to wear those pink psychedelic jackets!)

The bar mitzvah is not only a rite of passage, it is also a favourite Hollywood staple. Fans of The Dick Van Dyke Show will remember the classic episode in which Buddy Sorrell begins to act suspiciously. His friends fear he is having an affair when all along he was practising for the bar mitzvah ceremony he never had as a child [http://classicsitcoms.com/shows/dvd5.html].

More recently, Kirk Douglas appeared on the program Touched by an Angel as a grandfather who had no use for religion. Eventually he embraced his Jewish heritage and wanted to be "bar mitzvah'd" along with his grandson [http://www.touched.com/episodeguide/seasonsix/618.html].

And finally, a case of life imitating art: although bat mitzvah ceremonies may be common these days, that was not always the case. "Bubbe's bat mitzvah" tells the story of four women who didn't let age get in the way of formally celebrating their connection to Judaism later in life. Marjorie Edenfield of Newton, Mass., began a year of formal studying for her bat mitzvah when she was 75. "It was a wonderful year of learning… I was glad to be able to hold my head up and say I'm Jewish! I've never had such an exalted feeling. I consider it one of the high points of my life" [http://www.jflmail.com/oldarticles/1785.html].

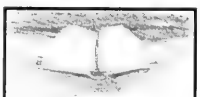
Giving your best amidst the worst

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Doesn't the Torah choose a strange time in Israel's history to offer the Ten Commandments? After 400 years in slavery, what does Israel understand of law? Forty years of wandering remain. Israel is not ready to establish a state. Why the Ten Commandments now? Why not wait until they enter Eretz Yisrael? Because God believes in putting forth the very best amidst the very worst of times.



The Ten Commandments gave Israel vision for their future. Even today, they tell what kind of life we're bringing up our children to lead.

When we hear news of the war against terrorism, we strain our ears to learn whether Israel has endured another attack. We feel a lack of control. Why?

It is partly because Al Qaeda is full of surprises. No one knows what's next. But we are also anxious because we have no idea whether peace will come when Al Qaeda is defeated. We see no vision of a different Middle East coming forth.

Just as the Ten Commandments bring the Children of Israel a vision of what society will be like in their new land, for our own security, we too need a vision of a world operating under rational, ethical laws. Lacking that promise, we feel uncertainty. To get through these "worst of times," the nations must articulate a vision of the best of times, just as the Torah did when it offered the Ten Commandments far ahead of Israel's entry into its land.

The Ten Commandments are also the basic covenant between Israel and God. There is wisdom in causing Israel to come close to God with this covenant. After 400 years of suffering in slavery, Israel is wounded. God has removed the bloody bandages from those wounds to allow them to heal in the open air of freedom. But when bandages come off, the pain is great. Sometimes people make the mistake of running from the one who removes the bandages from the wound, instead of from those who wounded them.

To keep Israel from running, either back to Egypt or helter skelter into the wilderness, now is the time for the Ten Commandments. They bind Israel to the God who freed us, the God who now makes a best effort to provide a framework for mutual responsibility.

Our generation, too, has its wounds, such as the Holocaust and the current loss of life to terrorism against Israel. These wounds make some want to run away from God. We tend to hold God responsible and then desert Him.

An Arab story tells of two friends travelling a treacherous road. One fell into a raging river. The other leaped in and saved him. The friend who almost drowned carved these words on a nearby black boulder:

"Wanderer! Here Nagib heroically saved the life of his friend Mussa."

Months later, the two happened to meet at the same spot. As they talked, a quarrel broke out between them. In anger, the one who had almost drowned was struck on the face by the very friend who only last year saved him.

The one who was struck picked up his stick and wrote on the white sand near the black boulder. "Wanderer! Here Nagib, in a trivial argument, broke the heart of his friend Mussa."

When Mussa's men inquired why he would record his friend's heroism in stone but his cruelty only in the sand, the wounded friend replied, "I shall cherish the memory of Nagib's brave assistance forever. This grave injury he just gave me will, I hope, fade from my memory even before the words fade from the sand."

The tablets of the Ten Commandments are the stones upon which are written, "Wandering Jews, it is God who brought you safely out of the land of Egypt, the house of bondage!" Whatever quarrels we may have with God in this time when Jewish celebrations, malls, and buses are blasted by terrorist attacks, let our distress pass quickly, like words written in sand. As we read again the everlasting memorial of our covenant with God, the Ten Commandments, may we allow them to draw us close to our God. Just as God gave a best effort when we were at our lowest ebb, now, when troubles beset us, may we make a best effort to remain loyal to our covenant.

'Berger's book has no impact on Chabad's work'

By RABBI ZALMAN A. GROSSBAUM

Guest Voice

Years ago while I was discussing human nature with a physician, he shared the following parody with me. A fellow comes to the doctor and asks him to examine a rash. The doctor sees at once that there is no need for alarm, that the discoloration is a trifle, and responds: "It's a good thing you came in today." What he meant but could not say was, if you would have waited another day, the blotch would have dissipated without treatment and there would have been no need for a visit to my office.

So, too, with the essay The Messiah Controversy by Martin Lockshin (CJN, Jan. 17). Lockshin creates unwarranted hysteria. To this writer, it appeared that Lockshin was using the CJN's prestigious Perspectives page to camouflage an outright sales pitch for David Berger's book, his mentor and object of his admiration for 27 years.

In his crusade for the proper interpretation of the Twelfth Principle of Faith, that is, dealing with belief in the coming of the messiah, Lockshin devotes no less than four paragraphs to Berger's virtues and integrity, yet summarizes the contentious philosophical controversy in a scant three paragraphs. He admits, though, "a one-page newspaper essay cannot do them justice."

Ever since Berger published his manifesto, there have been countless discussions amongst Chabad leaders as to the proper response. The primary challenge we faced was to respond and still not lend any credibility to his baseless claims.

Furthermore, Berger's book has had no impact on Chabad Lubavitch's outreach work. So why bother responding at all, some of the leaders say? I, for one, share that opinion. Why waste precious time, energy and resources on a moot, dead-end issue? And since Berger's book has not hindered our work, why engage in futile dialogue?

However, in his praise for the book, Lockshin has introduced the Canadian angle. Frankly, it is totally beyond belief how a philosophical, theological, hair-splitting debate is of special concern to residents north of the 49th parallel!

Lockshin also finds it necessary to include Berger's un-Jewish suggestion to "withhold support from the specific institutions." Then he makes two references as to the unique concern to us as Canadian citizens: "But I think that they are worthy of careful reading by all Jews particularly here in Canada," and in conclusion, he writes: "Right here in Canada, Berger would say, serious changes have taken place in Judaism in the last eight years. How are we going to react?"

Having been granted the sacred task to be part of the Rebbe's brigade to bolster Yiddishkeit in Ontario, I can proudly say that Chabad has changed the landscape of Jewish life. This is evident from our Chabad Houses, synagogue centres, Talmud Torahs and Torah institutions across Canada. Right here in Toronto, this would include our most recent outposts south of St. Clair Avenue and north of Major Mackenzie Drive. But why this growth bothers Berger and Lockshin simply boggles the mind.

I could go on, but I know that the Rebbe, while being proud of his 2,000-strong branches all over the world, would say we cannot rest and be satisfied with yesterday's success but must continue to bring Torah Yiddishkeit to every single person, wherever he or she may be. And the sooner we act, the sooner we will welcome Mashiach who will rid the world of conflict, strife and jealousy, and bring peace to mankind.

Rabbi Grossbaum is a senior shaliach of the Lubavitcher Rebbe and heads the Chabad Lubavitch Organization of Ontario.

JNF hikes cost of planting trees

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish National Fund is vowing to plant two trees in Israel for each one that a terrorist destroys this year, and it's counting on the community for additional support despite a 100 per cent increase in the cost of planting one.

Effective Jan. 1, the JNF doubled the cost of planting an individual tree to $18, citing rising costs in Israel for saplings, the labour involved in planting them and the administrative costs in Canada for tree orders.

"We think it's a very reasonable increase to go to Chai, it of course also being symbolic in Jewish tradition," said Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto, adding that JNF's last price increase was about 12 years ago.

"We're very thankful for the positive attitude and approach that people have taken to the necessary price jump."

JNF's annual Tu b'Shvat telethon takes place Sunday, Feb. 10, when volunteers will call people and urge them to buy trees.

Terrorists have burned down hundreds of thousands of trees and parts of forests in Israel, but JNF won't let them destroy the country, Prossin said.

"We know that people in the community will support this attitude because for decades, people today, their parents and grandparents, have planted trees in order to make Israel a green and productive land," he said.

The JNF has planted 220 million trees since Israel's birth and has saved much of its land from becoming desert, Prossin said.

"People know how important that the program of tree planting is to Israel and the historical sweep of the involvement of the JNF in having planted trees since Israel was created."

Tu B'Shvat, which fell on Monday, marked the beginning of the new year for trees. It is customary to plant trees and partake of the fruits of the land of Israel to mark the occasion. The holiday's purpose is to calculate the age of trees for tithing.

The Torah says that fruit from trees grown in Israel may not be eaten during the first three years. The fourth year's fruit is for God, and following that the fruit can be eaten.

A tree is considered to have aged one year as of Tu B'Shvat no matter when in the year it was planted.

To plant a tree ahead of the telethon, call the JNF office at 416-638-7200.

Bone marrow donor required

he gets her bone marrow transplant, and returns home.)

The transplant team at the hospital has told the family that they have several potential donors who match five out of six genetic markers. They hope one of those will be as nearly perfect as possible.

Even if a donor is found, Sheffield said, Makayla will be in the hospital for four more months, and then in semi-isolation – only family allowed to see her, no guests or children – at home for an indeterminate amount of time.

In this best-case scenario, Makayla will be more prone to leukemia and will have to deal with having wispy hair, being short (she will probably only grow to four feet tall) and being, very likely, infertile, due to the radiation treatment necessary to prepare her body for the transplant.

The effect this places on the family is devastating, Sheffield said.

"My daughter and son-in-law don't see each other, except in passing. We all get into stupid arguments about totally unimportant things. Vacations are impossible, and we are always frazzled."

What makes Sheffield particularly angry, he said, is how few people are listed on bone marrow registries. Out of about 10 million people eligible to be bone marrow donors in Canada, only 215,000 are on the Canadian registry. A mere 750,000 are on the American registry, he charged.

There are several private registries, one of which is Gift of Life, the successor to the Jay Feinberg campaign. (Feinberg, 33, from New Jersey, has chronic myelogenous leukemia. Mass screenings for him were held all over the world, including several times in Toronto and Montreal.)

At any of the private registries, including Gift of Life, there is a charge for all stages of the search. If the marrow has to be sent to a different country, there is a fee. In the United States, there is also a fee for the testing.

Sheffield also objects to the fact that many people on private registries are not also on the national registries – although many, he said, think they are.

He said he was astounded to learn that when people are tested in private drives, "only five per cent said that they would be willing to donate marrow to anyone other than the person being tested for.

"Is that just our people, or does it happen in other ethnic groups too?"

Many people also don't understand the process, Sheffield said. First, the initial test is a simple blood test. If you are a potential match, you are sent a kit that you take to your own doctor, who will take another blood sample.

If you are a match, "it takes two weeks of your time. There is some discomfort in the place in your hip where the marrow is withdrawn, but not enough to affect you for more than a couple of days – if that. Also, the marrow is regenerated immediately."

Sheffield said he is not looking for pity. "If I can get one person to join the registry, and that person saves a child's life, I will be successful," he said.

If you are between 17 and 59, and healthy, Sheffield urges you to contact Canadian Blood Services, at 1-888-2DONATE.

"You have to be prepared to do a mitzvah – and save a life," he said.

Beth Sholom to honour 98-year-old Rabbi Kirshenblatt

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Longtime teacher and spiritual leader Rabbi Jacob Kirshenblatt will be honoured by Beth Haminyan and Beth Sholom synagogues Feb. 16, 7:30 to 10:30 p.m., at Beth Sholom.

The event will include cocktails; a klezmer band led by former student Les Train; a silent auction that will include dinners with Globe & Mail columnist Marcus Gee, the National Post's Christie Blatchford, or entertainer Amy Sky; and a balloon bust. Proceeds will benefit The Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt

Rabbi Kirshenblatt, who will turn 99 this Pesach, arrived from Poland via Israel in 1929. He served as spiritual leader in Glace Bay, N.S., and in Ontario in Welland, Peterborough and Toronto. Along with Rabbi David Monson, he was a founder of Beth Sholom.

He has blown shofar during the High Holy Days every year since he was 13, a media release says. Over the years, he has taught thousands of bar and bat mitzvah students, many of whom have shown a huge interest in the tribute.

For many years, Rabbi Kirshenblatt has volunteered at Queen Elizabeth Hospital and Princess Margaret Hospital.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt is a longtime member of Beth Haminyan, a nearly 30-year-old congregation that features a traditional and participatory service, led entirely by members.

Joel Eisen, a co-chair of the event along with Norm Talsky, said Rabbi Kirshenblatt is a tremendous favourite with the children. A highlight of the shul year is Simchat Torah, when all the youngsters gather under his tallit, Eisen said.

The release describes him as a "diminutive [man], pockets bulging with candies [for the children], who speaks at least three languages, usually in the same conversation, and is increasingly frail, but with a sonorous, booming voice."

Eisen described the rabbi as a very humble man. In fact, he refused to allow the tribute, unless the evening would raise funds for the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma.

This centre treats symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder, which may include flashbacks, severe depression and anxiety, emotional numbness, and disruption in relationships, the ability to work or school functioning.

Chronically short of funds, it needs money for therapy, computers and for refurbishing its premises. Cost of the evening is $60, which is partially tax deductible.

Cotler-led project seeks non-Jews for global watchdog

"This globalized anti-Semitism cannot be fought by Jews alone but can only be fought by an international coalition involving the intergovernmental community, such as the UN, governments and political leaders everywhere, nongovernmental organizations, public intellectuals, academics, and civil society," Cotler said.

The Israeli government has endorsed the project. Michael Melchior, Israel's deputy foreign minister, told reporters the new anti-Semitism needs new strategies to expose and condemn it.

He said that while many Jewish organizations monitor this threat, one composed mainly of respected non-Jews of global stature would have more impact.

Plans are for the commission to be based in Switzerland, with offices in Jerusalem and New York. Details on funding and membership are yet to be finalized, Cotler said in an interview. The commission's board of directors is now being formed and will be announced at a later date.

Cotler told the founding meeting that classical anti-Semitism, which has been waning for years, denied individuals Jews the right to live as equal members of a free society.

By contrast, the new anti-Semitism denies the Jewish people the right to live as "an equal member of the family of nations," he said.

"In a word, Israel is the only state in the world today – and the Jews the only people in the world today – that are the object of a standing set of threats from governmental, religious and terrorist bodies seeking their destruction," Cotler said.

The two strains have a fundamental characteristic in common, he continued.

Both are "an assault upon whatever is the core of Jewish self-definition – be it the Jewish religion at the time of classical anti-Semitism, or the State of Israel as the 'civil religion' of the Jewish people under this new anti-Jewishness."

The "demonization" of Israel today is the contemporary echo of the medieval indictment of the Jew as "the poisoner of the wells," Cotler charged.

"In a world in which human rights has emerged as the new secular religion of our time, the portrayal of Israel as the metaphor for a human rights violator exposes Israel as the 'new anti-Christ' – with all the teaching of contempt for this 'collective Jew among the nations' that this new anti-Semitism implies."

Although the new anti-Jewishness has been percolating for 30 years, Cotler said a number of glaring examples in the last year have made the need for action urgent. These include:

- The World Conference Against Racism in Durban, where Israel was "the only state singled out for indictment."
- The singling out of Israel by the UN Commission on Human Rights as the only country to receive condemnation.
- Israel becoming the first country in 52 years to be specifically indicted by the Conference of the Contracting Parties to the Geneva Convention.
- The exclusion of Magen David Adom, Israel's emergency aid agency, from the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

"If anti-Semitism is no longer respectable and anti-Zionism in the form of the 'Zionism-is-racism' resolution has been exposed as a cover for anti-Semitism, what better mask than human rights – and the UN as repository of human rights – to carry out this process of distortion and defamation," Cotler said.

Cotler emphasized he is not suggesting that Israel should not be held accountable for violation of international law or human rights. "The Jewish people are not entitled to any privileged protection or preference because of the particularity of Jewish suffering."

The problem is that Israel has been "systematically denied" equality before the law in the international arena. What's more, he observed in an interview, anti-Jewishness at the highest levels is spawning a resurgence of old-style anti-Semitism in the form of physical assaults against Jews in the Diaspora.

"This pervasive and persistent anti-Jewishness constitutes a standing assault on democracies and human rights everywhere," he told The CJN.

This new type of anti-Semitism will have ramifications beyond the Jewish community, he said.

"Genocidal calls for Israel's destruction and racist terrorism singling out Jews everywhere are a clear threat to international peace and security."

The Middle East peace process is also jeopardized because the new anti-Semitism incites terrorism and "undermines the trust of even the most dovish Israelis."

גידי קורן וחברים

חקבנן מקרלטון

חופשה בלאס וֶגאס- קָשֶׁ

Hamilton federation blazes trail with new Web site

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Jewish community now has a state-of-the-art Web site that is the first of its kind in Canada.

The site – www.jewishhamilton.org – was launched Jan. 16 by Hamilton's UJA Federation using FedWeb, a system created by United Jewish Communities (UJC) in New York, the umbrella organization for 189 Jewish federations across North America.

FedWeb offers pre-designed templates that allow non-technical people in subscribing communities to customize and update their own Web sites. It also offers regularly updated subscription content, such as Jewish news from news agencies around the world.

Wendy Schneider, the editor of the Hamilton Jewish News community newspaper who co-ordinated UJA Federation of Hamilton's first foray onto the Internet, said FedWeb "is so wonderful for small federations like us... Unlike many sites that are never updated and only visited once, ours is alive and constantly renewed."

Depending on size, fund-raising capacity and features chosen from FedWeb's menu of options, each federation pays UJC a monthly fee for the tools to create and maintain a site.

Schneider said Hamilton pays $300 (Cdn) per month. She said FedWeb was chosen because it has no upfront costs, which can run into thousands of dollars for a Web designer, not including the cost of maintaining and updating a site.

Conceived at UJC's annual young leadership convention in March 2000, FedWeb was launched last April with an investment by UJC of $4 million (US) over four years. UJC's own Web site was the first to use the service, which has already won a design award from the Web Marketing Association, an American group that recognizes excellence in corporate Web sites.

So far 30 federations are online using the service and 20 more sites are expected to be launched by the spring

Other Canadian Jewish communities and organizations will soon be following Hamilton's lead.

By the end of 2002, UIA Federations Canada and local federations in Vancouver, London, Windsor, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal and Calgary will all have their own FedWeb-based sites, says Frank Simkevitz, a UIA Federation staffer who negotiated the Canadian federations' deals with FedWeb.

Although about 50 North American federations already had Web sites, most suffered from poor design and were little more than on-screen brochures, said JoAnn Abraham, director of UJC communications projects.

Offers daily late-breaking news

FedWeb is a cost-effective way to create dynamic and easily updated Web sites, as well as save money on mailings and newsletters and reach out to unaffiliated and Web-savvy Jews, Abraham said.

A 1990 UJC survey showed 33 per cent of American Jewish families relocate every five years and need access to a community. It also found more than 70 per cent of U.S. Jews are not affiliated with a synagogue, and that young, unaffiliated Jews are actively online.

To meet these needs, FedWeb offers options for a site's navigation bar ranging from a community calendar and information on local agencies – features found on Hamilton's site – to a local Jewish yellow pages, which Hamilton doesn't have.

Like other FedWeb sites, Hamilton's offers daily late-breaking news, articles on Jewish life and links to other Jewish Web sites.

And FedWeb is constantly tweaking its design and adding features, Schneider said.

Her volunteer committee was "searching for someone to do our Web site when one of our board members heard about FedWeb. As soon as I saw it, I fell in love with it and every other option paled by comparison," she said.

"Because we hadn't yet set up a site, we were in the best position to join up straight away."

Schneider was impressed with the help she had building Hamilton's site.

"We had so much help right from the beginning with technical support through a 1-800 number. Their response was so attentive.

"[Because] we were the first Canadian FedWeb site, the visitors' subscription section was not set up with Canadian provinces. I called the tech people, and within an hour, they had adapted it."

FedWeb also offered advice on generating revenue to pay for the site.

"They helped us set up sponsorships and we hope that eventually the site will pay for itself," Schneider said.

Currently a local sponsor, the Fowler Pearce Partnership, helps offset the site's monthly fee and a search is on for a real-estate company to sponsor the site's section on moving to Hamilton.

In addition to FedWeb's other advantages, being a link on the central UJC site is also a plus, Schneider said.

"Hamilton's Jewish community is looking to grow," said Schneider. "By being featured on the UJC site we hope people will hear about us and see Hamilton as an interesting alternative to a big city."

Gerry Fisher, executive director of Hamilton's UJA Federation, praised the committee responsible for launching the site. "This was a long time in coming and our volunteers did a good job," he said.

"The future of this community is directly linked to our ability to attract Jewish families to move here," said Fisher. "I have been contacted by several families wanting information about Hamilton and the Jewish community, and now 'jewishhamilton' provides us with a very good mechanism to advertise our wonderful quality of Jewish communal life."

Palestinian students challenge speaker at York University's Israel Week

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The only way to stop hatred is to expose it, said Itamar Marcus at York University's Israel Week last week.

"We don't want to have wars. We want to have peace," said the Jerusalem-based director of Palestinian Media Watch.

But Palestinian and Muslim students who attended Marcus' talk in York's Central Square, accused Marcus of promoting hatred against Arabs when he displayed one example after another, on slides and video clips, of Palestinian media and religious and political leaders encouraging children to follow the example of suicide bombers.

Itamar Marcus

"Ultimately, our goal is education for peace," said Marcus. "We're letting the Palestinians speak for themselves. Hopefully when the world sees what they're doing, there will be pressure on the Palestinians to educate their people."

He said that, while Palestinian schoolbooks are "not yet good," they are less vicious in their anti-Israel and anti-Jewish content than they were before his organization made some of their contents public.

Marcus was in town to speak at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. He also spoke at the University of Toronto, and in Montreal at McGill and Concordia universities.

His first challenger at York identified herself as a Palestinian woman and said she did not condone the messages he was talking about. "Is this [supposed to be] an example of all Palestinian people?" she demanded.

"I'm sure there are many Palestinians who are against what is being taught," said Marcus, "but what's tragic is the message the Palestinian Authority is giving their children."

Other Palestinians or Palestinian supporters accused Marcus of being unfair by showing examples only from the Palestinian world.

"What I'm saying is that Palestinian television is showing children that their role is to seek death. This is a tragedy," said Marcus.

"I don't know what you're trying to do here. If you're trying to promote peace, you're not," said a woman in a hijab. "You're giving a bad name to all the Arabs...saying that all Islam is just bad."

Jabbing her index finger in the air, she pointed at Marcus and accused him of doing the same thing that he said the Palestinian Authority was doing.

"How do you teach a child whose home is being demolished, 'Don't hate these people. Let's be brothers.'?" asked another woman. "It's impossible. You can't, because actions speak louder than words."

"There have definitely been Palestinian victims, but they were never victims because of what Israel initiated," said Marcus.

The discussion, which was intense, continued among Jewish and Palestinian students (or their supporters) for about half an hour after the presentation.

Marcus is concerned that Jewish students may not know how to answer the types of questions that were asked of him during his presentation.

Some of them don't know that the term Palestine originally referred to the Jewish state and are unfamiliar with much of Israel's history. The West Bank, for example, was under Jordanian rule from 1948 to 1967, when Israel won it in a defensive war, he told the students. "The West Bank area, before the Oslo accords of 1993, had never been defined as a Palestinian entity," he said.

Ultimately, said Marcus, he would like to produce materials for students that would give them some of the information and answers they are lacking.

Watch for an interview with Itamar Marcus in next week's issue of The CJN.

Concordia student elections annulled

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The question of who is going to run the undergraduate student government at Concordia University remained up in the air last week after the Concordia Student Union's (CSU) judicial board annulled the results of last November's byelection for a new council executive.

The victors, who have yet to take office, were members of a coalition called the Representative Union (RU), which promised a more moderate, less politicized administration than the far-left faction that had controlled the CSU for the last two years.

In a 3-1 vote, the judicial board decided that "irregularities" in the byelections rendered the results invalid, but did not call for a re-vote. What will happen next is in the hands of the CSU's council of representatives. General elections of the CSU, which represents Concordia undergraduates, are due to take place in March.

The judicial board cited the confusion that followed the disqualification of the RU on the first morning of the three-day election by the chief electoral officer Jessica Lajambe. She alleged that an RU slate member had attempted to bribe the leader of another slate.

The RU was cleared of wrongdoing later the same day.

The judicial board found that the byelection results cannot be accepted because the ballots of the 526 students who voted during the few hours the RU was delisted were annulled.

Only 226 of these students voted again during an extension of the election period, the judicial board noted, meaning the other 300 were disenfranchised.

The judicial board found Lajambe to have been incompetent and possibly biased against the RU because of her association with the former CSU regime.

The RU had forced the November CSU election after it collected 3,200 student signatures on a petition.

The RU won the election with 45.5 per cent of the votes, beating its nearest rival, the leftist Umbrella Party. The RU, however, has never been able to take office, having had to wait until a Jan. 9 deadline for challenges to the election. The CSU was led by an interim executive, headed by Patrice Blais, who stepped down Jan. 23.

RU president Chris Schultz said he finds the judicial board ruling unfair but that it would be senseless to ask students go to the polls again before March.

The RU was supported by Hillel, the Jewish students association, which objected to the former CSU leader's anti-Israel position and close links with Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, a highly visible lobby group for the Palestinian cause on campus.

Jewish community organizations, particularly B'nai Brith Canada, had denounced the former CSU leadership after its publication in September of a student handbook titled Uprising, for glorifying militancy and anarchy and for its anti-Israel tone.

In dealing with another complaint, the judicial board found Hillel not guilty of illegal campaigning for sending approximately 150 letters to its members in support of the RU.

The board reasoned that "it cannot be proven that the RU was aware of such campaigning on its behalf."

Why do we still have poverty?

The mandate of The CJN is to be the very best community newspaper it can be. Our core activity, of course, is to provide the news from around the Jewish world credibly, reliably and as comprehensively as possible, within the limitations of our resources and our weekly format.

The paper proceeds from the conviction that a better-informed Jewish community will be a healthier Jewish community and thus an asset to Canada at large and to Jewish communities around the world.

But our mandate calls upon us to stretch beyond our core activity from time to time.

As a result, more than three years ago, we sought to develop additional forums and vehicles for the exchange of ideas on subjects that are important to the community. Thus, we introduced The CJN Roundtable Discussion.

The inaugural roundtable was held in October 1998 and explored the subject The Jews of Toronto: Who we are and what we can yet be.

Subsequently, in successive years, we held meetings and published the proceedings on the topics After bar and bat mitzvah: developing a Jewish life and The changing Jewish family.

Last December, The CJN in conjunction with Jewish Family and Child Service (JF & CS) held the fourth such roundtable discussion. It explored the question Why is there still poverty in our community in the year 2001?

Leading the discussion was a panel comprised of Gordon Wolfe, the executive director of the JF&CS and Marvyn Novick, professor of social work at Ryerson University.

Wolfe delivered a concise and compelling overview of poverty as it affects the Jewish community of Greater Toronto.

Novick delivered a hard-hitting statement from a social policy perspective that urged the gathering to "challenge the dogma."

That dogma, Novick elaborated, is the traditional approach to poverty propagated by economic, fiscal and labour market analysts that attaches a higher priority to deficit elimination or to finding jobs for everyone than to restoring a public system of supports for the lowest income earners.

An invigorated and secure public support system, Novick said, is the key to reducing, if not eliminating, poverty in both the wider Canadian and the narrower Jewish communities.

To respond to the panelists, we invited an eclectic group of more than 20 guests, all of whom either work in the field, formulate policy related to the field or simply have an abiding and deep concern for issues related to poverty.

As it turned out, more than 20 guests was too many. There was hardly time for everyone around the table to state their opinions for the record, let alone engage in a freewheeling, uninhibited exchange of ideas.

But we did our best to record the essence of the roundtable. What follows is a summary of the discussion that unfolded that day.

Wolfe debunks common myths

JF&CS executive director cites alarming statistics

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite daily evidence to the contrary, there is still a widespread myth among Jews that there is no poverty or abuse in the Jewish community.

"It would be nice if that were so, but it isn't," pronounced Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) at The CJN's roundtable on Jewish poverty.

Fully one-third of the caseload at JF&CS, or between 450 and 500 cases, receive financial assistance from the agency, and these are individuals who already get other forms of assistance, Wolfe stated.

Other alarming statistics Wolfe cited included:

- Half the financial assistance caseload at JF&CS is made up of singles with disabilities, whether physical or emotional. Some are permanently unemployed.
- One-quarter of the financial assistance cases are comprised of single parents, mostly women, and six out of 10 single mothers are poor;
- The remaining 25 per cent of those receiving financial help from JF&CS are couples with children, or the elderly.

In the previous six months, Wolfe noted, JF&CS paid someone's first or last month's rent in 43 cases. In 18 cases, the agency paid utility bills, and in 19 cases, it had to find emergency hotel accommodation for those with nowhere else to go.

Poor families, Wolfe said, tend to have higher than average infant mortality rates and higher rates of smoking. As well, children in poor families generally have more school problems and suffer from poorer nutrition than children in better-off families.

Gordon Wolfe

The poverty level for a single person in Ontario in 2000 was $353 a month. Welfare brings in $120 monthly, while disability payments total $215 a month. JF&CS tops up financial assistance to $242 a month for a single person – still well below the poverty line, Wolfe pointed out.

For a single parent with one child, JF&CS provides help to a maximum of $332 a month (below the poverty level of $442 a month), while a couple with one child will have their income topped up to $390 a month (where the poverty cut-off is pegged at $549 a month).

So even though Jewish families get help from the community, many are still struggling, Wolfe said.

In addition, "it costs more to be Jewish. The rent is higher on the Bathurst Street strip. It costs money to belong to a synagogue or JCC, and kosher food is more expensive [than non-kosher]," he added.

Wolfe exploded another myth: that the provincial government has made deep cuts to its funding of child welfare. In fact, the Harris government, Wolfe noted, more than doubled funding in this area, from $357 million in 1996 to $748 million in 2001.

Even though JF&CS is an accredited child protection agency, it has never removed a child from a family solely because of poverty, he said.

Wolfe said poverty is "under-recognized" in the community, which cannot shirk its "full responsibility."

And it's not just about money, he said: "Poverty is not just the absence of money, but the absence of power, compounded by unemployment or underemployment."

His agency is opposed to a Jewish food bank for a variety of reasons, including concerns about kashrut, but also because the help JF&CS delivers "is in the best tradition of tzedakah, the highest level of which, according to Maimonides, is to help a person become self-sufficient."

Poverty becoming more entrenched, says Ryerson prof.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It isn't true that the best solution to poverty is a job, says Marvyn Novick. What makes a difference, according to the Ryerson University professor of social work, is public fund transfers.

Novick, whose research focuses on child poverty and whose experience in the local Jewish community dates back to the social policy committee of the then Toronto Jewish Congress, was one of three speakers at The CJN's Round Table on Poverty, held in December at the law offices of Goodman and Carr.

From his early experience, Novick believes that "within the Jewish community, there were high standards of social justice and social care that are carried into the general community."

Using the standard European understanding of poverty – the notion of "relative poverty" which encompasses the idea that it is socially unacceptable for people to be excluded from the prevailing life of their community – Novick explained that, for the Jewish community, low-income Jews could "survive in northwest Scarborough, but you would be excluded, unless you were close to shuls and other institutions." Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) recognized this 20 years ago, he said.

Novick cited the work of British researcher Richard Wilkinson, who has concluded that societies with lower levels of disparity have longer life expectancies, less homicide and crime and potentially, more robust economies. He also stated that relative income and social services – not absolute income and living standards – have the greatest impact on people's health.

In Canada, poverty is becoming more entrenched, Novick said. About 150,000 people a month use food banks in the Greater Toronto Area, with the fastest growing group being the working poor.

In the United States, he noted, a significant number of people go through a "revolving door" from social assistance to work and back again. Sixty per cent of welfare recipients have lower incomes once they go off social assistance than they did on it, he said. "The American 'miracle' in the '90s was to have the lowest unemployment rate in the industrialized world, and the highest poverty rate."

Governments that want to move people from social assistance to other forms of support have to invest in opportunities such as housing, child care, education and income support, said Novick.

In Sweden, he noted, single mothers could be off social assistance by the time their children were two years old, and at that time avail themselves of child care, living wages and shelter allowances.

In Canada in the 1990s, there was a "serious erosion" of public support, said Novick. "It's no accident that homelessness shows up on our streets."

The restrictions on eligibility for unemployment insurance (UI), for example, have been "significant." At the start of the 1990s, said Novick, 75 per cent of unemployed people would have been eligible for UI. By the end of the decade, that number was down to 30 per cent.

Social assistance, Novick explained, does not eliminate poverty, but it maintains people who are living in poverty.

Marvyn Novick

Also, from 1993 until almost the end of 2001, the federal government did not contribute to social housing, and the Canada Assistance Plan, which provided provincial governments with 50 cents for every dollar they spent on income support, was eliminated in 1995.

Toronto waiting lists for child care – a "critical" resource – have 17,000 names, Novick said. "These lives of children aren't placed on hold."

He also noted the emergence of user fees for recreational facilities such as swimming pools in Toronto.

"These erosions of public service for the most vulnerable have been accompanied by erosions of public systems of provision of support for the rest of us," he said, offering the public education system as an example.

Poverty will persist, he said, because the capacity for public systems to respond has been seriously eroded.

Gov't, community must acknowledge poverty, experts say

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish community needs to advocate on behalf of those living in poverty, agreed the participants in The Canadian Jewish News roundtable discussion.

"It's a shandeh to admit there are Jewish poor and so we intend to ignore it. We need internal advocacy in order to get poverty back on the [table]," said one expert on public policy.

Poverty is not a concern either of the provincial or the federal government, he said. "Health, education, public safety and a whole other variety of items are discussed, but poverty is not highlighted."

The community needs to engage the general public in ensuring that poverty becomes an issue again, "and that means working with politicians. Many of these issues are driven by public policy. If you can't even get an acknowledgement that this is an issue, you are not going to be successful," he said.

The four vulnerable groups, he said, are children, the elderly, mothers and immigrants. "We need to target some strategies specifically to those groups.

"There has to be a more co-ordinated approach on those target groups and we need to look at some specific programming in order to move the yardstick a little bit."

Go forward and plan, he said. "These are the areas we need to engage the community and government in.

"When the issue is not on the table, when the debate is not considered an important one, and when the government has absolutely no pressure on it to raise it on the list of priorities, then these kinds of discussions will not happen. Right now, there are no voices being heard by the government."

Alan Sandler, immediate past president of UJA Federation, said that the Jewish community has not stepped front and forward in its real obligations as Jews, both to the world at large and to our own community.

"I have said for years that we have never come forward as a whole and that is unacceptable. We have enough people in our community to come up with a workable solution," said Sandler.

"We have to come forward on a national basis, and we have to encompass all the faith communities. Internally, we better wake up to what is happening."

Young people in desperate straits will not have Judaism as part of their lives, said Sandler. "We need to work out how we can [provide] them with day care or pre-school and not view it as a handout.

"It is something that has to be incorporated into the community. That means having the synagogues and schools working together," Sandler said.

We also need to be creative in finding ways of providing housing and jobs, he said. "When Jews arrived in any country, the first thing that new immigrants got was a job. That does not exist anymore. How can we create that again?"

Job creation, however, is not enough, said Eva Landa, director of administration and financial assistance services at Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

"There also has to be education and childcare provisions. We see daily the frustrations of single mothers who somehow manage to get a job, but it is a menial job because they do not have the skills for anything higher paid. They end up with less money than they had on social assistance.

"They lose the benefits for their children such as dental and drug plans, and if they are lucky enough to be in subsidized housing, their rent goes up. It almost becomes a point of not being able to afford to work."

This situation is frustrating for both the individual and for the social worker who sees the family as being worse off than when they were on social assistance, said Landa.

She said the community needs programs that enable people to be qualified for a higher-paid job.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Ed Segalowitz

Jack Mintz, president and CEO of C.D. Howe Institute, a policy think-tank, said that job creation is critical, but it will not solve the problem.

"We have to advise people how to get back on their feet, and [we have to] put more effort into providing things such as child care.

"We should try not to have significant tax rates when people start working. Marginal tax rates have significant impact on incentive to work," he said.

The big question, he said, is what we do with the tax dollars we do raise. "Our problem is the misallocation of expenditures by the government. We have had cutbacks in the '90s because of decisions made in earlier years."

Although employment programs do not attack the fullness of the problem, they do help people find work a little sooner than they otherwise would have, said Ed Segalowitz, vice-president of community planning and development at UJA Federation.

"Whereas in former years, people might have offered jobs as a mitzvah, it does not happen now. People have to be trained, and they have to add value to the employer.

"For those who are part of the continuing case load, it just won't work. Our response has been targeted based on that understanding," he said.

Pam Medjuck-Stein and Roger Hyman

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation, said he grew up in poverty and he depended on community support. "Some families are unable to move out of poverty; they find it impossible to get out of the crisis. People have to be aware of that and move children out of the cycle.

'Housing an integral part in what a child achieves'

"If adults are not capable of moving out, we have to be able to help the children," said the rabbi.

He said the Jewish community has to decide carefully where to advocate, but "clearly, housing is part of the way to break the cycle.

"I have had at least half a dozen congregants come to me [in desperation] because of their inability to find adequate housing. That is a terrible social issue in Toronto."

It is a halachic and moral imperative "to reach out and sustain people as much as possible in relationship to the society in which they live. If we cannot get them to that level, they should at least be able to deal with the bare economic needs," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

Housing plays an integral part in what a child achieves, said Teri Kaye, director of family and community services at JF&CS.

"Many children living in inadequate housing transfer from school to school and cannot settle down to learn," she said. "Their concentration is not on their studies, it is on their home situation. Children cannot have a future without stable housing."

The problem of housing, in which people pay rent and then do not have enough for food, is a $500,000 problem, said Gord Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS.

"The Jewish community cannot take full responsibility for this because there is a limit to volunteer dollars," Wolfe said. "We can top up someone on welfare, but if we keep adding to that, we are suddenly a major supporter to someone in the Jewish community.

"[Without support from the government] we can never respond to this with volunteer dollars. I get very nervous when people depend on us and on volunteer dollars to survive," he said.

Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) does try to help people find jobs, said Wolfe, "but we are not very successful at it. It is a very difficult population to serve. It often doesn't pay people to work and we also don't get the jobs. Jewish employers do not call JVS," he said.

JF&CS sees many families that are "teetering on the edge," said Howard Hurwitz, the agency's director of children's services.

"They have difficulty accessing recreational, psychiatric and homemaking services," Hurwitz said. "I would like to see these families linked to other families who can help them. [There may be] families who want to help by making another level of contribution."

But there are [a number] of Jews who are not accessing the community, are not active in the community and are not comfortable in the community, and not just because they are living in poverty, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

"There is also the poor middle class. They are taxed, they put their children in day school, and so forth. Freeing up Jewish education is the key to continuity. In England, there are two communities, poor and prosperous; both have access to free Jewish education."

The problem with inviting all Jewish children into the Jewish school system is that many parents will not ask for help if they cannot afford it, said Pam Medjuck-Stein, a member of The CJN advisory board.

"There is no way around it unless we make Jewish education a right and there is somehow no request involved," Medjuck-Stein said. "The idea of education as a right, however, is not part of our community thinking."

Renee Climans, a social worker at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care said that the elderly in the community who are economically vulnerable are at a greater risk for developing health problems.

"We can treat them, but if we do not enhance their social situation, it will not help them significantly," said Climans. "We want to maximize seniors' independence, but with the cutbacks in subsidized health care, the lives of seniors are impacted."

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, rabbi emeritus at Temple Emanu-El, said that when hijackers destroyed the World Trade Centre, "they also hijacked some Canadian social policy.

"Until then, there was some progress being made about moving the issue of poverty onto the agenda. We have to get back on track, but there will not be a solution within the Jewish community. We have to build coalitions."

Tina Rosenbaum and Alan Sandler

Rabbi Bielfeld has spent a lot of time talking to government officials, "and I have concluded that in Canada, as perhaps in the United States and other countries, there is a significant aspect of denial as to the reality of the problem. We have to join with other communities, [including] the business community, to get them to face up to their responsibilities.

"We haven't even addressed how the next generation of kids can become more aware and more committed to eradicating the problem. It is a long-term project, and governments, as we know, have a short-term agenda."

There are thousands of Jewish students on campuses in the Toronto area alone who are not being educated on issues prevalent to our community, said Ron Somogyi, a University of Toronto student and a member of The CJN advisory board.

"These students will soon be leaders in the community; we will have the jobs to provide and we will make the financial contributions," Somogyi said. "There is a strong lack of education [about such matters] in that community."

Finn Poschmann, senior policy analyst at the C.D. Howe Institute, said that when we take a look at who is poor, transition issues are dynamic.

"What really matters is who is poor this year, next year and the year after that."

In a letter written to the CJN following the roundtable, Poschmann said family break-ups and formations are leading drivers of entry to and exit from poverty.

The meeting made clear that poverty exists in our community in 2001 owing to a failure by the government to transfer enough money to end it, Poschmann wrote in the letter.

"I think this would be a bizarre message to send either within the community or outside. The message reduces to 'we throw up our hands; it is someone else's problem' and I cannot imagine that would would help anyone.

"The importance of fostering a sense of self-determination, rather than helplessness or powerlessness, is crystal clear to students of human behaviour. I cannot see why community leaders would want to send a contradictory message to their constituents or to anyone else, except by mistake."

It is true, he said, that in the latter half of the 1990s, some provinces started spending less on social assistance and more on other things. "However, the same period has shown a clear downward trend in poverty; if one were to insist on a link, it would have to be between lower welfare spending and lower poverty. Obviously, one should beware of such reductionist views," said Poschmann.

Another public policy expert agreed that unless there is public investment in community services, poverty will persist.

"Polls over six years have shown that when Canadians ask what to do with surplus, more wanted to invest in health education and child poverty than tax cuts.

"There is no problem in terms of public perception. What we have is a problem in who defines imperatives."

Female suicide bomber kills 1, wounds more than 100

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper staff

JERUSALEM — Police have decided to significantly increase their presence in central Jerusalem following a suicide bombing last Sunday that killed one person and left more than 100 injured.

Additional forces will be brought in from around the country to try to make residents and business owners feel safe and secure again on central Jaffa Street, the scene of Sunday's attack and a shooting attack last week. In August, a suicide bomber killed 15 people when he blew himself up at a pizza restaurant on the busy street.

Hezbollah's television station Al Manar said the suicide bomber responsible for Sunday's attack was 20-year-old Shinaz Amuri, a female student from Nablus.

The dead Israeli was identified as 81-year-old Pinchus Toktaly, a tour guide.

This was the first suicide attack carried out by a woman in the current conflict.

She studied at the A-Najach University in Nablus, defined as a "hothouse for suicide bombers" by the Shin Bet security services. At least six of the 120 suicide bombers who have carried out attacks against Israeli targets were students at the university, which is also considered a Hamas stronghold.

No group took immediate responsibility for the blast.

Of the wounded, two were in serious condition, four sustained moderate wounds and the rest light injuries.

Jerusalem police chief Mickey Levy said that there were police officers among the injured.

Levy himself was hospitalized not long after the bombing, complaining of chest pains. He suffered a major heart attack upon arrival at Bikur Holim Hospital and is in serious condition.

This was the second attack in less than one week in the same area. Two Israelis were killed and dozens wounded when a Palestinian opened fire at the lower end of Jaffa Street last week.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) quickly condemned the latest attack. "The Palestinian leadership strongly condemns the suicide attack against Israeli civilians in Jerusalem," the PA leadership said in a statement. It also called for the return of U.S. Middle East envoy Anthony Zinni "to resume the trilateral security co-ordination and negotiations without delay."

The PA statement also called on "the Israeli government to immediately lift the siege imposed on the Palestinian people and their leadership in order to enable the Palestinian leadership to carry out its national and security duties."

But Israel said PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was directly responsible for the attack and warned the bombing would have repercussions.

"Arafat is encouraging terrorism, he's sending [bombers] to Jerusalem," said Ra'anan Gissin, an aide to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. "We will continue to systematically dismantle the terrorist infrastructure," he added.

One of those injured in the attack was Mark Sokolow, a 43-year-old attorney from New York, who survived the Sept. 11 attacks on Manhattan's World Trade Center.

Sokolow's office was located on the 37th floor of the WTC's southern tower. He was saved when "one of the workers in my office heard the explosion in the [northern] tower, and told us all to leave the building immediately. That's how we were saved from the second explosion."

Sokolow was in Israel with his wife and two young daughters to visit their oldest daughter, who is studying in Jerusalem.

The family was buying shoes on Jaffa Street when the blast occurred, and Mark sustained an injury to his right eye. A hospital spokesperson said he was suffering from a injury to his eye socket, "but we believe we will be able to save the eye." Sokolow's youngest daughter was also lightly injured in the explosion.

Last Sunday's blast took place some 20 metres from the Sbarro restaurant where 15 people were killed by a suicide bomber in an attack last year.

Birthright Israel serves to unite young Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Birthright Israel, which brought together 6,000 students from around the world for a 10-day free trip to Israel, was a reminder of how far-flung, yet unified the Jewish people can be.

It was also a reminder that Jews in some parts of the world live under tremendous stress and some look to Israel to alleviate it.

Alexandro Margulis, an Argentine "madrich" with a Birthright group, said bleak economic prospects in his country are pushing young Jews to seek better lives abroad.

For some, Israel presents a land of opportunity, but "I don't think Israel is the first option," he said.

Prior to the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States was the destination of choice for many Argentine Jews. Since then, Spain and Mexico have displaced the United States as the number one destination, though "more than a few come to Israel."

Margulis, who works with the Masorti Movement in Buenos Aires, estimated that 30 per cent of the Argentine Birthright participants were considering aliyah and the Jewish Agency has stepped up its recruitment efforts in the South American nation.

With Argentina's GDP at $12,900 (US) per year (versus Israel's $18,900) and with people merely "surviving" and finding it hard to get jobs, many Argentine Birthright participants will choose Israel, Margulis said.

A "mega-event" that brought together thousands of Birthright participants was a roaring success, judging from the spirit of the participants and the jam-packed dance floor.

The importance of the event to Israeli leaders was also evident judging by the high level participation in Birthright activities.

Prior to the official kick off of the event, Birthright dignitaries were treated to a cocktail reception at which former prime minister Ehud Barak spoke briefly. The official even itself was addressed by President Moshe Katsav while Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was scheduled to meet Birthright dignitaries later in the week.

Early in the mega-event evening, philanthropist Charles Bronfman, one of the founders of Birthright, whipped up the already exuberant audience with a pep talk and, pointing to a Canadian contingent which had lifted a massive Maple Leaf flag above their heads, shouted: "I am Canadian, I am Jewish and I love it."

Entertainment was provided by a modern dance troupe, a specially assembled choir, a comedian/host, and by an up-and-coming Israeli band, Gaiya, which performed a rollicking version of "od aveenu chai," propelled by a great rhythm section.

Reporter's notebook

It's been about 15 years since my last visit to Israel and my cousins in Tel Aviv told me, "Paul, you won't believe the changes in Israel."

During my last trip, I visited my cousin Avner in his office in the Tel Aviv "boursa," the diamond exchange. At the time, the exchange occupied two office towers in northeastern Tel Aviv. Today, the area is like a second downtown, with many new office buildings and hotels. The area bustles with activity and the very comfortable Haifa-Tel Aviv train – which I took rather than be stuck in traffic on an inter-city bus – stops a few hundred metres away. A covered above-ground walkway links the area to the train station, and the train has proven very popular among commuters in the last few years.

Rechov Shenken is another interesting area of Tel Aviv. Located near the Carmel Market in central Tel Aviv, it might be considered a Middle Eastern version of Toronto's Queen Street, a run-down thoroughfare that has been trendified with funky shops and restaurants. Bazel (Basel) Street in north Tel Aviv is another thoroughfare that offers interesting shops and good restaurants.

Falafel/shwarma restaurants in Israel seem to have increased their menu, at least as far as side dishes go. As I recall it, 15 years ago you'd get a choice of humus, techina, salads, and chareef (hot sauce) for your pita sandwich.

Today, restaurants feature massive quantities of help-yourself side dishes, ranging from traditional vegetable salads, to spiced cabbage salads, "chippim" (french fries), grilled red peppers, pearl onions, grilled eggplant (outstanding), and more. Yum.

The Western Wall is the heart of Jewish Jerusalem, but many people are surprised to learn the familiar part of the wall – the part fronted by the large plaza – is only a portion of the Herodian structure that still remains.

Before its destruction by the Romans in 70 C.E., the Western retaining wall of the Temple ran for almost 500 metres in a north/south direction.

Over the years various neighborhoods encroached on the Wall while the ground level gradually rose. Today much of the 500-metre Wall lies within the Muslim quarter and below ground level.

The Western Wall tunnels, opened more than five years ago, skirt the outside (western edge) of the Wall and run from near the plaza to its exit on the Via Dolorosa. When the exit for the archeological tunnels was opened in 1996, Palestinian leaders spread wild rumours that Jews were seeking to undermine the Dome of the Rock, leading to riots.

Eight people were killed in the violence.

Tensions remain and when exiting, visitors are met by guards armed with Uzi submachine-guns to escort them through Arab neighborhoods back to the Jewish quarter.

The tunnels themselves are fascinating, with their underground arched support structures, Hasmonean water tunnel and pool, Second Temple road and scale model.

Our guide was intimately informed about the details of the ancient temple. Midway through the tour, he pointed to a spot that is considered the most holy place on the Wall. The reason for its sanctity, he said, is that it is believed to stand closest to the Holy of Holies, where the Ark of the Covenant stood inside the Temple Mount in ancient times.

A column from Temple times

When the tunnel was being excavated, a well-known rabbi began digging into the Wall, in an easterly direction under the Temple Mount. He was looking for a secret storeroom where some believe the ancient Temple implements were hidden to prevent them from falling into the hands of Romans.

The menorah and other instruments from the Temple that are illustrated on the famed Arch of Titus in Rome are said to be decoys, the guide explained. Illustrations of Temple implements found in recent years in excavated Second Temple-era homes differ in important details from the carved work on the Arch.

That leads some to believe that the real implements were hidden away, he continued.

The guide acknowledged all this as speculation. When Arabs learned of the digging, they "beat up" the rabbi, and the Israeli government sealed the excavation to avoid further trouble. Years later, they opened the tunnel exit in the Arab quarter.

Tel Aviv remains Israel's New York, a commercial and entertainment centre, and as a result, residents pay New York-like prices to reside there.

Home prices advertised at a Re/Max office on Ibn Gvirol Street in north Tel Aviv told the story. Three-and-a-half and four-room apartments – not bedrooms, but rooms – of approximately 100 square metres (1,076 square feet) were priced in the neighborhood of $300,000 (US).

No wonder many young couples, unable to afford Tel Aviv's extravagant prices, are moving to nearby bedroom communities like Kfar Saba.

Car bomb kills former Lebanese warlord

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A leaflet issued in the name of an anti-Syrian Lebanese group claimed responsibility for the death last Thursday morning of Elie Hobeika, a former Lebanese minister and leader of the Israeli-backed militia involved in the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon.

The statement said the former warlord had betrayed his country and was a Syrian agent.

Lebanese officials said Hobeika and three of his bodyguards were killed when a Mercedes was blown up by remote control next to Hobeika's luxury sport utility vehicle as he was about to drive away from his home in a Beirut suburb.

The claim of responsibility, made in Arabic by a previously unknown group calling itself "Lebanese For a Free and Independent Lebanon," was faxed to Reuters news agency in Cyprus.

It said the assassination was a message to Syria to leave Lebanon, where Syria has about 20,000 troops and effective political and military control.

But Lebanon's chief military magistrate said the killing could have been masterminded by the Israelis, while Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's representative in southern Lebanon, Sultan Abu al Anian, said "the assassination was plotted and carried out by the Israelis."

Israel denied any connection to the explosion. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said the allegations "aren't even worthy of a response," and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Israel has "left Lebanese territory. We don't want to play [a role] there anymore."

In a statement, Lebanese President Emile Lahoud said Hobeika was killed to keep him from testifying before a possible war crimes trial against Sharon in Belgium. Lahoud did not say whom he believed was behind the killing.

Hobeika, 45, commanded the Christian Lebanese Forces militia, which carried out the massacre of hundreds of Palestinian refugees at Beirut's Sabra and Shatila refugee camps after Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

The militiamen entered the camps after their leader, president-elect Bashir Gemayel, was assassinated in a bombing initially blamed on Palestinians. It turned out Gemayel was killed by the Syrians, who opposed his alliance with Israel.

Hobeika later headed a number of Lebanese government ministries as part of several cabinets. He said in July he was willing to testify against Sharon and that he had irrefutable proof of his own innocence in the 1982 killings.

Zinni quoted criticizing Arafat, settlement policy

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. peace envoy Anthony Zinni told American Jewish leaders last week that he believes Israel's settlement policies increase Palestinian frustration.

But he also spoke warmly of some of the leaders of Israel's defence establishment and said he is totally opposed to the right of return to Israel for Palestinian refugees, because it would lead to the elimination of the State of Israel.

He also rejected the Palestinian idea of having a foreign observer force in the territories.

Senior officials in the PA had told Zinni that the "hard core" of terrorist organizations in the territories numbered around 3,000 people and with a "green light" from Arafat, the PA could deal immediately with 1,000 of them and "get rid of the problem" without a civil war.

U.S. officials in recent days have been saying that there "are not many people left in Washington who aren't fed up with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, with his lies, and his inaction."

According to these officials, "the situation is only worsening and could escalate into something much worse."

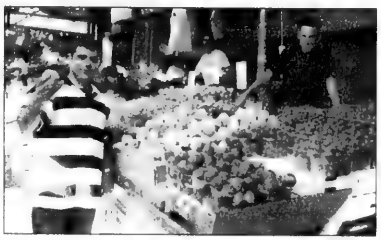
Israel's Desert Shopping

Want to buy a camel? How about a sheep? It may be difficult to get them through Canada Customs, but they're definitely for sale at the Bedouin market in Beersheba.



EveryThursday, starting at 6 am, the market offers spices, trinkets, crafts, clothing, baubles, beads, high-tech electronics and yes, even the occasional animal. And while scenes of camel caravans carrying the Bedouin to market are reserved for old movies, this shuk (Hebrew for market) is still a colourful tourist attraction.

Today, the Bedouin market is a microcosm of Beersheba's transition from an ancient watering hole to a flourishing city of nearly 150,000. Here, the Torah records history's first peace pact when Abraham made a covenant with Abimelech, the king of Gerar, for access to water wells. It was sealed with Abraham's gift of seven (sheva in Hebrew) lambs, accounting for the name Be'ersheva or well of seven – translated to English as Beersheba. In 2002, this fascinating Negev desert capital, where it's common to see Jews and Bedouins walking on city streets, is coping with rapid population growth.

But, if haggling at the market isn't what you bargained for, try visiting Beersheba's Museum of Bedouin culture (over 100,000 Bedouin live in the Negev region alone) or the nearby Israel Air Force Museum in Hatzerim, about 6 kilometres west of Beersheba.

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce
The Sixth Annual
Passover Literary Supplement.

We invite the authors and poets among our readers to submit their works. The works must be previously unpublished, original fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. The fiction cannot be longer than 1,500 words.

We must receive your submissions
no later than Feb. 15, 2002
at The CJN, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205,
Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4.

If you want us to return the submissions, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so. The editor.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our seventh annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on February 21. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, February 1, 2002. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 8, 2002.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of February 21, 2002.

French Jews fed up with anti-Semitism

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Jewish comunity leaders in Paris reported last Friday that a bullet had been fired at a bus carrying 60 Jewish children in the French capital. No injuries were reported. It was the most recent incident in what leaders here have called a wave of anti-Semitic aggression.

Jews in the Paris region have stepped up their drive against the hostility that many feel has reached epidemic proportions.

More than 600 people attended a Jan. 20 rally against anti-Semitic violence, held in the Paris suburb of Sarcelles. Among them were representatives of Christian and Muslim communal organizations and high-ranking officials from all the major political parties in France.

It was the third such demonstration in the Paris suburbs in the last three weeks.

In staging these demonstrations, French Jewish organizations have adopted a more assertive approach as they demand that French authorities respond to the increasing violence with more than words.

The demonstrations were prompted by two separate arson attacks against Jewish community sites in the Parisian suburbs of Creteil and Goussainville.

On Dec. 31, in the waning hours of 2001, vandals set fire to a classroom in the Jewish school Ozar HaTorah in Creteil.

Days later, in perhaps the most serious episode, witnesses saw some 30 youths between the ages of 12 and 20 hurl rocks and Molotov cocktails at a Goussainville Jewish home that also serves as the local synagogue.

For more than a year, French Jewish leaders have called on the government to confront the dramatic rise in anti-Semitic violence that began with the outbreak of the Palestinian intifada in September 2000.

Officials from CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations, counted 320 acts of anti-Jewish aggression last year. Most of the acts involved vandalism and verbal threats.

But after the attack in Goussainville endangered the lives of a mother and her four young children, a feeling of urgency and outrage has spread through the Jewish community around Paris.

Adding to the anger was President Jacques Chirac's recent statement that "there are no anti-Semitism and no anti-Semites in France."

The remark resembles the long-held position of several high-ranking members of the Socialist-led government, including, most notably, the interior minister, Daniel Vaillant.

Vaillant, the man most responsible for the implementation of law enforcement policy in France, has in the past disputed CRIF's statistics on anti-Jewish incidents.

Taking aim at such officials, Moise Cohen, president of the Paris Consistoire, told the audience at the Creteil rally, "If Jews attacked Muslims and their schools, there would be a public outrage, a political and media outrage. So why is it that when Jews are the victims of aggression, our politicians and our media remain silent?"

CRIF president Roger Cukierman was even more pointed in his condemnations of the French government's response to the situation.

"We are told that we exaggerate," he said, "that violence is a general phenomenon, that it is not specific to Jews, that the authors are ill-at-ease young people, that statistics show that anti-Jewish violence has diminished.

"Well no, no and no," he said. "We are not exaggerating."

The French government's perceived inaction has drawn sharp criticism in recent weeks from some Israeli officials.

In addition, several Jewish journalists in the United States have compared the present climate in France to the one in the World War II era, when the Vichy government collaborated in the deportation of 76,000 Jews to Nazi concentration camps.

Sparking the outburst of anger from abroad was a report a month ago that, at a London dinner party, the French ambassador to England, Daniel Bernard, had referred to Israel as "that shitty little country."

This incident raised the question in some circles as to whether the French government's stance regarding anti-Semitic violence is indicative of a broader anti-Semitism throughout French society.

French Jewish leaders have been more ambivalent about the idea that anti-Semitism in France is a widespread problem, choosing to present anti-Jewish aggression as a phenomenon located predominantly in communities where Sephardi Jews and Maghrebins – Arabs of North African descent – live side by side.

Cohen, for example, opened his speech in Creteil with the assertion: "France is not an anti-Semitic country."

He finished the speech with the comment: "For our part, we won't fall into the trap of seeing anti-Semites everywhere, but there is no worse disease than the one that is not diagnosed and acknowledged."

The chief rabbi of Paris, David Messas, echoed these comments, stating, "This is why we are here today, to respond in front of the republic that we love.

"We are democrats," he continued, "because we're French and because we're Jewish."

Such sentiments reflect the rhetorical strategy Jewish leaders have employed as they emphasize the French government's responsibility to protect the rights of all its citizens.

At Creteil, however, there were signs that the mounting anger of French Jews may begin to steer their leadership down a less diplomatic road.

A local journalist who asked not to be named, indicated that some are beginning to provide their own security.

"I live in Boulogne," another Paris suburb, "where we have a lot of problems, and we have to ensure our own security since the police don't want to come," the journalist said. "Almost every week we have incidents – slurs, stones, fights."

Belgian court to say in March if Sharon to be tried

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — A Belgian appeals court will decide on March 6 if Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon should be tried for alleged war crimes associated with the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon.

The three-judge panel scheduled the ruling for early March after a five-hour closed hearing last week in which Sharon's attorney, Adrien Masset, listed objections to a war crimes trial. The court will hold one last hearing on January 30 for the submission of final documents.

Israeli officials have objected that war crimes charges against 30 world leaders have been submitted to Belgian courts, yet officials have expedited prosecution only in Sharon's case. The 30 include Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, and Cuban President Fidel Castro.

Masset argued in court last week that Sharon enjoys immunity from prosecution in the same way that Belgian parliament members and ministers have immunity. Sharon's attorney also argued that European law forbids the extradition of a man who has been tried for an alleged offence in another country, whether he was found innocent or guilty.

Sharon's position is that he has already "stood trial" in Israel for Sabra and Shatila in the Kahan Commission investigation. The panel ruled in February 1983 that Sharon (then defence minister) bore indirect responsibility for the massacre.

Masset argued last week that since there is no link between Sabra and Shatila and Belgium, "Belgian law has no jurisdiction."

Michael Verhaeghe, lawyer for the massacre survivors, said his legal team is confident the court will take the case, and override Sharon's objections. Lebanese lawyer Chibli Mallat, who is also representing the survivors, said his team was opposed to moving the case out of Belgium.

Artist determined to be successful

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Determined to make painting her career, Sarah Bing was not upset that her first showing was postponed by the closing of a Calgary gallery that promised to sell her work.

Instead, the 21-year-old turned to the Calgary Jewish Centre to host her exhibit.

"I'm going to paint and I'm going to make money with my paintings," Bing said. "It doesn't appear to be making money right now, but I think that's because this isn't an art atmosphere. People don't come here to buy paintings," she said, referring to the centre's fitness patrons.

The fourth-year University of Calgary fine arts student is just months away from graduating with honours. This year, she is focusing on abstract work.

One series in the centre's exhibit, which ended Jan. 19, uses blues and greys to portray buildings in a city. The series was painted after Sept. 11.

"These ones are the most successful out of all of them," Bing said. "They are like a breakthrough because I was working with the paint and not against the paint.

"I named one of them Revelation because I think that's what it is. They could be any city. They are just buildings.

"I think it's better to have them be whatever you want them to be, whatever the audience wants them to be because it's more personal for them."

When Bing put the series in the context of New York's twin towers, she became reflective.

"With everything that happened in New York, that affected me pretty [strongly]," she said. "I was going to call one of them Aftermath but someone said it was too direct, so I didn't."

Bing said Judaism has not been a strong influence in her art, but she has always been interested in painting more religious subject matter.

"I've done a piece of my family with a menorah," she said. "My parents love it and they have it in their house and they show everybody when they come in. I did it in second year and I haven't really done anything since then."

The Calgary native grew up surrounded by artwork, including the work of her great-uncle, renowned artist Sam Borenstein, and her grandmother Gella Bing. High school teachers and family members encouraged her to pursue her dream of becoming an artist.

"I was always going to be an artist, a painter. My mom said I could draw better than her when I was two," she said, laughing. "I don't know if there was any truth to that."

In order to paint, Bing said, she needs to be focused and can't be distracted.

"It's the mood... I find if I'm in a bad mood, I can't paint because my mind is on other things. I find when I'm in a good mood, then I can just paint like there's no tomorrow."

While at school, Bing has access to the university's studio. When she graduates, she plans to rent a large apartment and make one of the rooms into a studio of her own.

Bing is counting on a Toronto art company to sell her work or find a market for her to sell her paintings independently. She sold two pieces before the exhibit at the centre and another two paintings during the show, defending her prices of $1,500 and up that she is asking for some of her larger pieces.

"I don't think it's expensive art because you go to a gallery and you can't get a painting this size for the amount I'm asking for," she said.

People, she said, don't want to spend money on art.

"They have what they have and if it doesn't go into their collection, they don't want to have it. I don't think the Calgary market is ready for the work that I have."

But Bing is remaining optimistic and looks forward to showing in Toronto and Montreal.

"I think I will be able to support myself there," she said.

TORONTO MANDOLIN ORCHESTRA PERFORMS AT LEAH POSLUNS

A unique assemblage of musicians known as the Toronto Mandolin Orchestra is scheduled to perform in north Toronto this week. The program includes traditional Ukrainian, Russian and Jewish music, as well as selections by Rimsky-Korsakov, Vivaldi, Rossini and others.

Instruments in the orchestra include every member of the mandolin family (prima, alt, tenor, mando-cello and mando-bass) plus accordion, flute, oboe, clarinet and percussion.

Musicians include soloist Iraida Erokhina, a master of the three-string domra, a mandolin-like instrument common in Russia; flautist Kate Anderson, a founding member of the Onyx Wind Quintet; panflute soloist Kevin Budd, who builds panflutes (also known as panpipes) and composes for them; oboist Senya Trubashnik, formerly of the Moscow Philharmonic; and mandolinist Eric Stein, an acclaimed klezmer musician who founded the klezmer ensemble, Beyond the Pale. The conductor of this semi-professional community orchestra is Alexander Veprinsky.

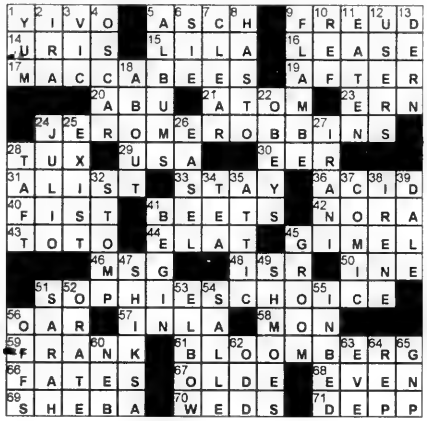
FIVE SMOOTH STONES

We were driving southward through the Shephelah when Mike Rogoff, our guide, pulled the van over to the shoulder and drew our attention to a ridge of hills to the right of us and a roughly parallel ridge to the left.

As the Shephelah consists of numerous low hills and valleys and some of the most productive arable land in Israel, the distinction of this particular locality was not readily apparent. It was, like much of the previous terrain, carpeted in low greenery with plenty of firs and eucalyptuses.

The place apparently did not have a name. We were about a 40-minute drive west and south of Jerusalem, about two dozen kilometres from the Mediterranean, and roughly inland from the southern port cities of Ashdod and Ashkelon, two of the Philistine cities of the Bible.

ANSWERS TO CROSSWORD PUZZLE ON PAGE 43.



It was here, Rogoff explained, that the Philistines and the Israelites camped before the famous battle that brought David, the future king, to national prominence. Rogoff cited the biblical passage from memory: "The Philistines were standing on the mountain on one side and Israel was standing on the mountain on the other side, and the valley was between them" (I Samuel 17:3).

Here, he said, the warring nations determined that one man from each side would fight the contest for them. Young David went to a nearby brook and drew the five smooth stones with which he intended, with the help of the Almighty, to smite Goliath, the behemoth of the Philistines. From the specific contours of the terrain, many biblical scholars are convinced that this is the only spot where, roughly 3,000 years ago, the decisive confrontation could have occurred.

Soon, driving over a crest, our guide bade us look to the west; through a break in the trees, we glimpsed far-off Ashdod on the horizon, its buildings reduced to faded silhouettes in the afternoon sun. We were headed to Beit Guvrin and Tel Morasha, two adjacent archeological sites that are easily accessible from Jerusalem and comprise an excellent destination for a half-day excursion.

In our week of sightseeing in Israel, we had encountered relatively few tour buses on the roads; owing to the current political troubles, many places normally overflowing with visitors seemed sadly deserted. But as we reached Beit Guvrin National Park, two large buses pulled in ahead of us, each carrying soldiers, male and female respectively.

Most of them looked about 18 or 19 years old. Dressed in military uniforms and accessorized with weapons, they were being given the tour of their country that, in Israel, is a perquisite of military duty. As they filed down a staircase into the network of caves for which the area is renowned, they sounded like a happy (and happy-go-lucky) group of high-school students.

When they emerged from underground a few minutes later, we moved to take some photographs. Instantly obliging us, they smiled and waved for our cameras. Noticing our red-and-white maple-leaf pins, a few called out, "Thank you for coming!" They seemed thrilled that we were visiting their country.

Now it was our turn to explore the caves that generations of local residents had dug, eons ago, in the soft rock beneath their homes. These subterranean chambers were intended as storerooms, workrooms, cisterns, underground olive presses, and even a columbarium for pigeons. Many descend the equivalent of several floors below ground. There are an estimated 5,000 caves in the region; the local fields are said to be honeycombed with them; and a small number have been opened to visitors.

The gratitude of young Israeli soldiers made the most striking impression on our travel columnist at Beit Guvrin National Park. [Bill Gladstone photo]

The town flourished in the late Roman era as Eleutheropolis, and became known in the early Arab period as Bet Jibrin (Guvrin); the Crusaders also built a city here. The adjacent Tel Morasha is much older, and dates from biblical times. To cite only part of its remarkably checkered past, it was a Judean-era city that later figured in the Maccabean wars and even later was a capital of the Idumeans, or Edomites, who came from east of the Jordan. Despite all this, Tel Morasha remains a huge mound of earth that has barely been sounded by archeologists.

The caves are certainly impressive. But of all we saw and heard at Beit Guvrin that day, it was perhaps the gratitude of the young soldiers that made the most striking impression on me. By what small act did we deserve their thanks, in comparison to their own immense contributions?

Bill Berle CD features old and new songs

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Musician, teacher and composer Bill Berle's new CD Winds of the Negev, to be released Feb. 1, will feature new music as well as two old recordings that have been digitally remastered.

Both the title track, which was recorded on LP by the BBC London Orchestra and Chorus 32 years ago, and the Solove (Nightingale) Fantasy for solo violin and orchestra, which was premiered by the York Symphony Orchestra (YSO) in October on the orchestra's 40th anniversary, are on the 60-minute CD.

"The York Symphony, under director and conductor Roberto De Clara, is one of a number of alternative symphony orchestras that has many accomplished musicians who donate their services because they have a deep love and dedication to music," Berle says.

Berle, who comes from four generations of musicians, says his father, Gershon Berul, one of the first members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) and a violin teacher who taught such notable musicians as Victor Feldbrill and Moe Kaufman, composed two folk melodies in 1910 when he was a violin student at the Odessa Conservatory of Music in Russia.

These two folk melodies, says Berle, have lingered in his memory since he was a child. When he began composing Nightingale Fantasy in 1990, he wove his father's haunting melodies into the three movements: Moderato Alla Gypsy, Tarentella Alla Espana and The Flight of the Nightingale Alegro Polka-Brillante.

When Nightingale Fantasy premiered on the YSO's 40th anniversary, Berle, who has performed with the York Symphony for more than eight years, conducted the 75-piece orchestra.

Canadian violinist Lance Ouellette, who has won many awards and performed in recitals across Canada and in the United States, is featured in Nightingale Fantasy.

Winds of the Negev contains music ranging from folk and classical to modern Israeli music. Besides the title track, the songs on the CD include On Your Bar Mitzvah Day, Six-Day Israeli Marching Song, Holiday in Israel, Our Israel, and Canadian Falls, his first composition which he wrote when he was 16.

Berle, who received his musical training from his father, says his first love was the piano. He also knows how to play the violin, accordion, saxophone, clarinet, organ, guitar, bass and drums. He attended the Royal Conservatory of Music and completed courses in choir and conducting.

During World War II, he joined the Canadian Army and was a member of the Army Show. Upon discharge, he formed his own band and appeared on national radio and television with various celebrities, including actor Lou Jacobi and singer Yaffa Yarkoni.

Berle has served as musical director of the Royal Alexandra Theatre for 16 years, and has a Klezmer quartet that performs at community functions and synagogues. Berle also performs free concerts at seniors' homes and communal agencies.

He acknowledges having music as a career can be difficult. It has become increasingly difficult for musicians to make a living performing as more and more people use prerecorded music for their events.

"So music has become a sideline for many musicians," he says, adding that with cutbacks, less people are studying music as a career.

Bill Berle's CD, which is produced by Canadian Distribution WB Music, 416-635-1928, is available at major record stores and Judaica shops.

My Dear Clara a film about persistence

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When Clara Greenspan, a Canadian citizen, visited her native Poland in 1938, she was introduced to Haim Blum, with whom she fell in love.

Before returning to Montreal, she married Haim, in order to facilitate the visa requirements for him to immigrate to Canada and be with her.

Fully expecting to be reunited with him within a month, Clara travelled back to Montreal. Little did she know she would wait almost 10 years before she would see him again.

My Dear Clara, directed by Garry Beitel and airing on WTN Feb. 6 at 9 p.m. ET, tells the story of the young couple's struggle to be together, narrated mostly through the letters sent to each other across thousands of miles.

At the time, the Canadian government was restricting visas to European refugees, especially Jews. It also didn't help Clara's cause that the law allowing a husband to sponsor a foreign wife did not apply the other way round. Clara was told she could not sponsor her husband.

Soon events would overtake them. Poland was divided between Germany and the Soviet Union, and Haim found himself in a labour camp deep in the Soviet Urals.

But this is a story of persistence. Clara never gave up, despite the odds. When the war ended, she managed to track his whereabouts through the Red Cross. After repeated attempts negotiating the quagmire that was Canadian immigration beaurocracy, Clara decided to write to the prime minsiter, William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Shortly thereafter, the Prime Minister's Office intervened, and in 1947, she was finally reunited with her husband. The law forbidding wives to sponsor husbands was changed.

Clara and Haim spent the rest of their lives together in Montreal and had two children.

This 44-minute documentary was skilfully researched by Beitel and well put together, combining letters, interviews and archival images.

Organ tissue donation institute gets $1M gift

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The newly established Bertram Loeb Organ-Tissue Donation Institute has been named for the philanthropist who donated $1 million to help establish it.

Ottawa resident Bertram Loeb provided the funding for the Institute so that Canada will increase its rate of organ donations and move up from 16th place in the rankings of developed countries.

"Our goal is to increase public and professional awareness about the importance of organ and tissue donation, not only in the Ottawa area but across the country," said Loeb.

The non-profit institute, to be based at the Civic Campus of the Ottawa Hospital, is made up of nine volunteer directors from the fields of medicine, religion, public affairs, law, community service and medical ethics. Its chair, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, has been actively involved in promoting organ donation for many years.

At a recent ceremony held at the National Arts Centre, Rabbi Bulka said the mandate of the institute "is not to do anything that anyone else is already doing, but to fill in the niches that are not being filled already."

Its goal of increasing organ donations will be met through initiatives in education, research, and lobbying appropriate groups for support.

Loeb also donated $25,000 to be used to stimulate positive action in support of organ-tissue donation in Canada through recognizing an outstanding individual or group contribution to this cause.

At the ceremony, Rabbi Bulka presented $40,000 to Kerry Smith, a corneal retrieval nurse who in 1998, formed the Corneal Donation Program and who is currently regional director of the Ontario division of the Eye Bank of Canada.

"We look forward to your making Ottawa a city of vision," said Rabbi Bulka.

Corneal transplant recipient Scott Racine, who attended the ceremony, said he is now able to do things he could not do two years ago, "the most wonderful of which is that I can see my children."

Loeb, founder of Israel's Supersol chain, has, over the years, contributed to numerous causes both in the general Ottawa community and in the Jewish community, including the Loeb Medical Research Centre, the Loeb Building for the Arts and Humanities at Carleton University, the surgical wing at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario and the Loeb Adult Training Centre.

He has served as president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, chair of the United Jewish Appeal of Ottawa, first vice-president of the Zionist Organization of Canada and has been involved in numerous other organizations.

This is just the beginning, said Loeb. "We need about $5 million and I plan to go out and raise funds for this very worthy cause."

JGH offers Lifeline

MONTREAL — The Auxiliary of the Sir Mortimer B. Davis Jewish General Hospital (JGH) recently announced its partnership with Lifeline Systems Canada Inc., a personal response and support service.

Designed primarily for individuals who live alone and are concerned about their safety, the service provides help at the touch of a button worn on a pendant or wristband. The help button activates a small in-home communicator that automatically dials the Lifeline Response Centre. Trained operators answer the phone within seconds and dispatch assistance by contacting a designated neighbour, a family member or emergency services.

"Considering that we treat a high volume of frail, elderly patients and encourage those who are able to live independently within the community to do so, this service is very valuable," says Dr. Howard Bergman, chief of the JGH division of geriatric medicine.

Fran Yagod, chair of the Lifeline Program, who is trained to install the service, notes that it is simple to use and will provide an important service to the community.

For more information, phone 514-344-2172.

THE SPRING MARKET & YOUR HOME

By Paul F. Slavens
Manager-Broker, Paul Slavens Real Estate Inc.

Just as the flowers will bloom, "For Sale" signs will be springing up all across Central and North Toronto. Some homes will move quickly and the owner will proudly show off the "Sold" sign on the front lawn. Owners are very proud of this sign, because usually it means that the ideal goal of moving up to a more desirable home or a lifestyle change will be achieved.

But what can one say of those properties that sit there month after month? The "For Sale" Sign lingers out on the front lawn, as though there is something wrong with the house. After 34 years in the real estate business, I can offer one insight about those signs and that is: It isn't always the fault of the property.

The RIGHT BROKER can -- and does -- make a difference. All brokers are not the same. The reason Paul Slavens Real Estate Inc. has succeeded in delivering results in rising and falling markets comes down to one key point. We are owner-managed and -operated, and are dedicated to building an organization with key agents that are committed to us. Quite simply, we attract the BEST AGENTS. That means the broadest mix of buyers can be tapped to look at your property, especially those in touch with the "thirty-something" market that is powering real estate sales in our marketplace.

In addition, my role is as MANAGER-BROKER; I do not compete against my representatives. Instead, my sole function is to lend my marketing skills, experience and prestige to help our agents negotiate a satisfactory sale. I help close deals.

Perhaps this Spring, you will be contemplating selling your home. You've heard some talk about the market, and it's been some time since you've had an updated opinion of the value of your property.

Here are several points to consider when selecting a BROKER. All of them are reasons you should call the "SLAVENS TEAM".

Longevity: Is there a proven track record behind the Real Estate Broker you are considering? How many years has the Agency been in business? How many properties have they successfully negotiated and completed the sale on behalf of satisfied clients?

Owner/Manager: does the principal Broker sell, in competition with his own Sales Representatives? In there someone in the organization who can provide objective, impartial analysis concerning your transaction?

Agents: Are there experienced, professional sales representatives in the office? How long have they been with the Company? The longer they stay with the Company, the greater likelihood that they are skillful and successful producers.

Advice: Have you been given a thorough "look" at your property, with insights on all of the many small marketing tips that can help make it sell quicker, and for a better price?

Price: Is the offering price realistic, and are you knowledgeable about comparable sales in your area, determining whether your home is comparable or not to these other properties?

Mortgage Financing: Can your Broker provide you with sources of funds for your next transaction, and make the sale of your present property more attractive to the buyer?

If the answers to the above are NOT in the AFFIRMATIVE, then you should talk to an agent at Paul Slavens Real Estate. If you call our office and mention this column, a qualified representative will give you a free, no-cost, no-obligation property market evaluation.

In other news: We are pleased that RICHARD SHERMAN, a Residential specialist, has joined us as an Associate Broker, after successfully marketing real estate in Toronto for over 17 years.

In addition, we are pleased to announce that VERONICA KEY has joined the "Slavens Team", as a Sales Representative. We welcome Veronica, who has enjoyed being a sales leader for over 13 years in the central core with a national Realtor.

As of January 2002, we established a Real Estate Appraisal Division, under the leadership of CRAIG LAINE, a certified Residential Property Appraiser.

Contrary to news reports in the media about a "slower economy", we are proud to boast that Sales are active, & the selling prices are stable, with interest rates at their lowest levels in many decades.

On Dec. 10/01, I visited an old couple. A 5 yr. old boy lit the Chanukah candles while his grandpa recited the prayer. His sister, their mother (a mech. eng.) & myself were listening and grandma was taking pictures. This 36 yr. old mother lost her husband from cancer. Without their knowledge, I decided it was my duty to try to unite her with a healthy & well-educated husband. Please reply to CJN Box #7404.

Lawrence Hart is Maccabi Canada's new president

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maccabi Canada's new president, Dr. Lawrence Hart of Toronto, is looking forward to what he hopes will be a new and productive era for Canada's largest Jewish sports organization.

Lawrence Hart

At a recent national board meeting in Montreal where he was installed as president, Hart bid a heartfelt adieu to his predecessor, Roy Salomon of Montreal – also known as "Mr. Maccabi," who served as president for eight years. Hart said he couldn't be more aware of the "very large shoes" he had to fill in the half-century-old organization.

"I only hope I'm up to the task," said Hart, a past president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Setting out his agenda, Hart said he wants to bring Maccabi Canada "into the [country's] mainstream of Jewish life" and enhance its image, "not purely as a sports organization," but as one that fully integrates sports with Jewish identity, communal life, Israel and leadership.

"We want Maccabi Canada to be a household word," he said.

Hart said he also wants to attract a younger generation of leaders and focus fund-raising efforts on a national, rather than regional, level. In addition, he wants to make Maccabi Canada more cohesive and to get past "parochial" issues that used to divide the organization, such as territoriality.

Salomon said the new national office has moved from Montreal's Cavendish Mall to the YM-YWHA's Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre. That should result in more integrated activities between the Y and Maccabi Canada, such as joint fund-raising and programming and sports clinics.

Salomon said this is the first Y on the continent to house a Maccabi office, and it may serve as a prototype for other cities.

Israel grouped with France for Euro qualifying tournament

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israel's national soccer team has been placed in group number 1 for the qualifying campaign of the Euro 2004 Soccer Championship. The group includes world and European champion France, as well as Slovenia, Cyprus and Malta.

Observers believe the draw gives Israel a reasonable chance of advancing to the playoff round. For Israel, the chances of winning first place in any group are slim, and the battle for second place in the group – and a ticket to advance to playoff games – will likely be against Slovenia. Cyprus, which caused problems for Israel in the not-so-distant past, is likely to be a factor, especially when each of the teams are expected to get six easy points with expected victories over a weak team from Malta.

Fifty nations, divided into 10 qualifying groups, will compete for the title. The team that finishes first in its group will automatically advance to the championships, which are to be held in Portugal, while the runners-up from various groups will have a second chance to advance to the playoffs. They will play each other in a wild-card round.

Bridge with Gitelman

Bridge is a game with almost universal appeal. It is not difficult to find other bridge players in almost every country in the world. The game is enjoyed by people of all ages, religions, and walks of life. I recently played in a tournament in Palm Springs, California with a partner who comes from a rather unique walk of life. My partner was Bill Gates, currently the wealthiest man in the world and one of the greatest businessmen in history.

Bill is very much in love with the game of bridge. His schedule does not allow for very much leisure time, but he tends to spend a lot of this time either studying or playing bridge. This work has really paid off for Bill. Although he has been playing bridge for only a few years, he is already a very fine player. Here is an example of Bill in action from the Palm Springs tournament:

Fred	Bill	This is how the bidding went:
♠ A754	♠ QJ8	Bill	Fred
♥ 3	♥ A87	2NT	3♣
♦ K1087	♦ AQJ	3♦	3NT
♣ 10532	♣ AK86	Pass

Bill's 2NT opening bid showed a balanced hand with 20 or 21 high card points. I bid 3♣, the Stayman convention, asking Bill if he had a 4-card major. When Bill denied a major with his 3♦call, I settled for 3NT. While 5♣ turns out to a better contract than 3NT, there is no reasonable way to reach this contract given the bidding methods that our partnership was using.

The opening lead was the ♥K. Think about how you would play this hand as declarer before reading on.

First things first – count your winners. This should be standard procedure when you are playing in a notrump contract. There is 1 trick in spades, 1 in hearts, 4 in diamonds, and 2 in clubs. That's a total of 8 tricks so it will be necessary to develop an extra winner in order to make 3NT.

If the defenders' clubs are divided in a reasonable fashion, it will be possible to develop a 9th trick in that suit. The problem with this approach, however, is that the lead will have to be lost. The defenders will probably then be able to win 4 heart tricks and 1 club trick to defeat the contract.

A better approach is to depend on the spade finesse. Hold up the ♥A until the 3rd round and pass the ♠Q. The contract will succeed whenever the ♠K is on your left or if your right hand opponent was dealt that card along with fewer than 4 hearts.

That is exactly how most experienced bridge players would play this hand as declarer. Bill Gates found a slight improvement. After winning the 3rd round of hearts, Bill played the ♣A and ♣K. He was rewarded for his foresight as his right hand opponent had been dealt the ♣QJ doubleton! The risky spade finesse was now unnecessary (which is just as well since the ♠K was on Bill's right). Note, however, that if the club layout had not been favourable, Bill would have been able to fall back on the spade finesse.

Bill, who has an extraordinary ability to do math in his head, was quick to work out that there was only a 6.8% chance that a doubleton ♣QJ had been dealt. That may not seem like much, but being able to take advantage of small extra chances is one of the things that separates the men from the boys in bridge.

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Toronto-based company, Bridge Base Inc, is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. Where are our Jewish guts, ingenuity?

Why do we Jews always accept anti-Semitism as an ugly necessity that crops up in every generation while we wait on the sidelines until its rotten stench dissipates, taking with it some of our pride and some of our lives?

Where is the Jewish call for courage? Why are free Jews, living in perhaps the best-schooled time in history, not actively and personally addressing this painful earache of humanity – anti-Semitism? Why isn't the Toronto Jewish community, from the Beaches to Richmond Hill, marching hand in hand leading protests against hatred?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In a recent Ha'aretz article, journalist Daniel Ben Simon wrote about how French Jews are experiencing anxieties that evoke bleak memories of the Vichy period. Last month, in Britain, Lord Greville Janner, a Jew and veteran Labour politician, stated: "You can't always see anti-Semitism, but you can always smell it." He was referring to increased anti-Semitism in the House of Lords and on the British street.

Yet, neither Ben Simon nor Janner, as Jewish leaders, offered solutions to their Jewish communities on how to fight anti-Semitism, as though there wasn't any. After all the persecution and anti-Semitism we have suffered, one would think the creative Jewish people would grasp the importance of a plan of a talmudic nature to defend ourselves.

There are Jews who will deal with today's anti-Semitism by listening to speakers explaining and defining it, but not submitting any viable responses to it. Some Jews will respond to the call to fight anti-Semitism by stating that through Torah observance and doing mitzvot they are playing a role. Perhaps they have a point, but history has shown this is not sufficient.

Whatever community we come from, it is imperative that we deal actively with certain realities. Anti-Semitism exists, as we saw clearly in Durban at the anti-racism conference. We don't need more programs to reaffirm that fact. Listening to speeches about the rise of anti-Semitism, with no solution as to how to fight it is an exercise in self-abuse.

If our businesses were being attacked or getting bad press, we'd fight valiantly to turn things around. Gerry Schwartz, the Bronfmans and other community leaders have done this brilliantly. Let's use the same tools to fight anti-Semitism.

When we did not receive government funding for private schools, we scrapped like junk-yard dogs until Mike Harris gave in. Some resilient Jewish parents knew how to win that struggle. Let's use those pugilistic skills to battle anti-Semitism.

It is time for us to establish a well-thought-out structure, utilizing every Jew who is up to the task (Jewish professionals cannot handle this task alone), to efficiently and aggressively fight the malaise of anti-Semitism. Let's do it with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, Jewish students on campus, and especially synagogues. Perhaps Jewish Toronto Tomorrow could facilitate an endowment to finance this operation.

Toronto and those who battle, by the passion of their plea, can be a light unto other Jewish communities.

If we decide not to fight back, then when the gray smoke clears, we must realize we have made a choice this time – we chose not to attempt to do everything available to us to unearth and defend the truth. We will also have abrogated our personal and collective responsibility to fight hatred and anti-Semitism, and manifested weakness in the eyes of our children and friends.

Diaspora Jews need to be brave and fight a good fight. Like Nachshon Ben Aminadav, who dove into the Dead Sea before the rest of the Children of Israel escaping from Egypt, we all need to stand up against the murky coldness of an undertow called anti-Semitism. It's time!

About Life

Dear Ella,

This year I made a very important New Year's resolution to myself. I would rather not divulge what it was, but suffice it to say, I was very determined to make myself reach my goal this year.

Here it is not even six weeks into 2002 and I have already failed. I was so gung-ho when I started and my motivation just dwindled as the temptations became stronger and stronger. It is not that I don't have the desire to make my resolution work, it is something that I desire and think about all the time, but I just can't seem to get there.

Now I am very down and can't get out of the same old rut that I have been in most of my life. I'd love some advice that might get me up and going again.

Resolution Snag

Dear Resolution Snag,

Resolutions are usually all about the direction and/or content of our lives. The answers are universal, regardless of what you are striving for.

It is obvious you have a strong desire to obtain your goal, but long-term goals are plagued by the interferences and emotions that everyday living brings. It makes it almost impossible to stay completely focused 24-7.

You must allow yourself to be human and not consider a setback as a failure. If you were climbing a mountain and reached an impasse causing you to go back down before you could climb higher, that would not be failure – that would be more challenging. All the work you've done just before you reached that impasse marks a successful step to reaching your ultimate goal. It sometimes takes many setbacks to finally reach the summit.

If you have made that resolution to yourself, than you must have given some thought to making it an achievable mission. Cut yourself some slack and follow that winding road up the mountain.

Keep that image of how sweet it will feel when you finally reach the summit burning vividly in your mind.

Al Qaeda in Gaza, Lebanon

Operatives on the ground, intelligence sources say

By SHARON SADEH and SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Al Qaeda terrorist network is attempting to transfer its base of operations from Afghanistan to Lebanon, the Times of London reported last Friday. The same day, the New York Post reported that Al Qaeda operatives have taken refuge in Lebanon and the Gaza Strip.

According to western intelligence sources, the Times reported, a senior operative of Osama bin Laden's organization, a Yemeni national who operates under the alias of Salah Hajir, arrived in Lebanon two weeks ago and has had meetings in Beirut with Hezbollah leaders. The Times noted that Hezbollah, a Shi'ite Muslim organization and Al Qaeda, Sunni Muslim, are "unlikely bedfellows," but it said, "There is substantial evidence of a working alliance between the two groups dating back to the early 1990s."

Since Hajir's arrival in Lebanon, according to the Times report, he has also met a radical Sunni organization called Usbat al-Ansar, based in the Ain al-Hilweh refugee camp in Sidon. This group is also reported to have close ties with Al Qaeda – a number of Usbat al-Ansar operatives recently returned to Lebanon after fighting with Al Qaeda forces in Afghanistan, the report said.

The New York Post reported that American and Israeli intelligence officials have recently identified senior associates of bin Laden in Lebanon and Gaza. These officials, the report said, are concerned that the Al Qaeda leaders who fled Afghanistan could now try to set up new terror cells in the Middle East. The Al Qaeda leaders who were recently seen in Lebanon and Gaza are known to have met with local terror organizations.

Israeli defence sources confirmed last week that they in fact have information about the infiltration of several Al Qaeda members into the Gaza Strip, apparently via tunnels below the border with Egypt at Rafah. Head of IDF military intelligence Maj. Gen. Aharon Ze'evi had already reported about the arrival of Al Qaeda members in Lebanon.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Insurance Deadline

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has welcomed the recent decision by the parties to the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC) to extend the deadline for filing a claim, to Sept. 30, 2002. The National Association of Insurance Commissioners established the ICHEIC in October 1998 to address unpaid insurance policies issued to victims of the Holocaust. A copy of the claim form can be accessed at www.icheic.org, or by calling 1-800-496-1974. In Canada, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association has also established a help-line which can be reached 8:30-4:30 Monday to Friday at the following numbers: From Toronto: 416-359-2008; toll-free in English: 1-800-860-3413; toll-free in French: 1-888-361-8070.

ISRAEL

Argentina Visit

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon plans to visit Argentina soon to speed up aliyah from the crisis-ridden nation. Speaking Jan. 23 at an absorption centre where he greeted new arrivals from Argentina, Sharon called immigration a prime objective of his administration.

Minister Resigns

JERUSALEM — Israel's first Druze cabinet minister has resigned. Minister Without Portfolio Saleh Tarif, facing bribery allegations, submitted his letter of resignation to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon Jan. 27. Sharon praised Tarif, who was responsible for Arab affairs, for being Israel's first non-Jewish minister and said he hoped Tarif would prove his innocence quickly.

Reservists Rapped

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defense Force chief of staff has lashed out against a group of reservists who refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Controversy is growing in Israel after more than 50 reserve officers and soldiers took out ads in newspapers voicing their refusal. Lt. Gen. Shaul Mofaz criticized the group, saying, they "do not represent reservists who understand their mission very well and work day and night for the shared aim of providing security to Israel."

WORLD

Terror Lawsuit

NEW YORK — Relatives of a slain Jewish couple want to question Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and five Palestinian security chiefs as part of a $250 million (US) lawsuit. The action, filed in the United States by the family of Yaron and Efrat Ungar last year against Arafat, the PLO and Hamas, claims Palestinian officials were responsible for the couple's deaths in a 1996 terror shooting.

Liberation Marked

MOSCOW — The man who led the Soviet Army's liberation of Auschwitz attended Holocaust Day commemorations here Jan. 27. The ceremony attended by Gen. Vassily Petrenko, 90, was one of many across Europe marking the 57th anniversary of the death camp's liberation.

Gunshots at Kids

PARIS — A single gunshot hit a school bus carrying Jewish children near Paris last week. It caused no injuries, but shattered the windshield, police reported.

Britain 'Failed'

LONDON — Britain did not do enough to help Jews escape the Holocaust, according to a leading historian. Tens of thousands of Jews fleeing Nazi Germany were refused entry into Britain, said David Cesarani, a professor of history at Southampton University and an adviser to the British government. "The uncomfortable truth is that Britain failed to respond with urgency to a genocide in progress when it could do something about it," he said.

Czech Marker

PRAGUE — A plaque has been erected to remember Czech Jews who were sent to concentration camps. Only 200 of the more than 2,600 Jewish residents of Pilsen, who were sent to concentration camps in 1942, survived World War II. Pilsen's mayor apologized to survivors that it took 60 years for the city to put up the plaque.

NELFTY Reunion

CLEVELAND — A reunion is planned for those who were active in the Northeast Lakes Federation of Temple Youth (NELFTY) between 1969 and 1974. NELFTY, now known as National Federation of Temple Youth – North East Lakes Federation (NFTY-NEL), is the Reform movement's youth organization. The reunion will take place in Cleveland Nov. 1-3, 2002. For details, visit www.nelfty.com.

Heeb Debuts

NEW YORK — An alternative magazine aimed at younger Jews has debuted. The first issue of Heeb features an article about a former Jewish convict; an interview with the man who made Trembling Before G-d, a documentary about gay and lesbian Orthodox Jews; and a photo essay about Jews with Afro-style hairdos.

Survey Says: Good News for Jews

WASHINGTON — Jews are considered by other ethnic groups to be hard-working, intelligent and strongly committed to family, according to a study released Jan. 24 by the American Jewish Committee.

Between 27 per cent and 30 per cent of non-Jews report contact with Jews at work, school or in the community, the report says.

Fifty-eight per cent of non-Jews say they know a Jew, and 28 per cent feel "close" to one.

The research also shows that people have a poor understanding of the number of Jews in the United States, with respondents estimating on average that Jews make up 18 per cent of the population. The actual figure is close to two per cent.

But officials caution that while Jews are increasingly more accepted in society, old stereotypes persist.

In a 1998 survey, 12 per cent of Americans were identified as anti-Semitic. In 1990, 16 per cent of non-Jews said they would object to a relative marrying a Jew, compared with 13 per cent in 2000. Only nine per cent said they would object to living in a majority-Jewish neighborhood, compared with 14 per cent in 1990.

Tories' Shabbat ballot precludes Jewish vote

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews who are shomer shabbat will be effectively shut out from choosing the next premier of Ontario.

The vote to replace Mike Harris as premier and leader of the Ontario Progressive Conservatives will take place March 23, a Saturday, meaning observant Jewish members won't be able to cast ballots.

While the party is allowing a proxy vote, it won't be holding advance polls. But a proxy vote is a non-starter for observant Jews, as it is un-halachic, say three prominent Toronto rabbis.

According to Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David Synagogue, a proxy vote in this case is counter to Jewish law because one cannot ask an agent to perform a specific task that is prohibited for Jews on Shabbat.

"[An agent] can only do something on Shabbat if it is part of their general duties," Rabbi Scheim told The CJN. For example, a synagogue custodian can turn on lights and appliances on Saturday because he or she does it anyway as part of their overall tasks, and is not asked specifically to do so, he said.

But casting a proxy vote is a specific task, thus making it forbidden on Shabbat, even if performed by a non-Jew. "There's no halachic way it can be done," Rabbi Scheim said.

Rabbi Moshe Lowy of Agudath Israel of Toronto Congregation agreed, saying one cannot appoint a non-Jew to do a particular task that is prohibited for Jews on the Sabbath.

Proxy vote is a non-starter

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, head of the Orthodox Va'ad Harabanim, will also counsel his congregants not to engage in a proxy vote. "It should not be done," he told The CJN, noting that an even worse scenario would be if religious Jews asked non-religious Jews to cast ballots for them.

He said all Jews should write letters to political parties imploring them "to change the rules."

Under PC party rules, a proxy vote can only be cast by a fellow party member who lives in the same riding as the voter.

The scheduling of the leadership vote has angered many Jews, who say they are being disenfranchised.

A proxy vote is "fundamentally unworkable," says Bruce Gilboord, an Orthodox Jew and member of the York Centre PC riding association. "It's a crazy situation. They've sabotaged Sabbath observers' ability to carry out their democratic obligations."

Gilboord said Jews are angry in other ridings, including Thornhill and Eglinton-Lawrence. He said Seventh-day Adventists concentrated in an Oshawa riding are also upset, as the Christian group also observes the Sabbath on Saturdays.

Late last month, Ted Eker, president of the York Centre PC Riding Association, wrote to party president Reuben Devlin, noting that the association has 189 members, "our highest number in many years. However, 154 of these members have indicated that they are unable to vote on Saturday, March 23 for reasons of religious conscience."

As things stand, the letter states, "the current provisions for proxy voting would make it theoretically impossible for the vast majority of the membership of the York Centre riding to cast ballots in the leadership process, with only 35 members available to cast ballots for the other 154."

Gilboord said it is ironic that Jews won't be able to reward the Tories for the government's education tax credit, which provides financial relief for parents of children in Jewish day schools. Tory insiders say the party has signed up a lot of Jewish members, including Orthodox ones, since the tax credit was announced last spring.

"With one hand they give us the tax credit and with the other, they smack us," Gilboord said. "We can't show our gratitude in a tangible way."

A remarkable statement

Justifiably, many Canadians worry about losing those aspects of our national character – some would say even more than the ones we've already lost – that distinguish Canadian-ness from American-ness. It is an inevitable, reasonable concern given the vast disparity in size between our two adjacent populations and the myriad "fallouts" in the fields of trade, commerce, culture, science and research that result from that difference.

Since Sept. 11, some Canadians have also added fears for our military sovereignty to the well-chronicled anxieties about the "traditional" aspects of our threatened national sovereignty.

Concern for all aspects of Canadian sovereignty must not be dismissed. Canadian-ness is too precious a quality to lose. Indeed, to some extent, the widely felt melancholy and bittersweet outpouring of affection at the recent passing of Peter Gzowski was an affirmation of that unique sense of Canadian identity and national character that was Gzowski's generous, lasting legacy to the millions of Canadians who listened to him or read his writings for almost four decades.

Gzowski, more than any politician or institution, was able to tie us together, from coast to coast, with a multi-textured, national fabric woven from the many diverse, colourful threads of Canadian regions, cultures, heritages and aspirations. Gzowski enabled us to know what Canadian-ness meant without the usually mandatory reference to American-ness.

But nor should we exaggerate the impact of some of the differences between us and our neighbours. For in certain cases, the differences between us, namely, the sheer size and power of America, redound to our mutual benefit. A case in point was evident in the state of the union address delivered last week by President George W. Bush.

The president committed his administration to fighting terrorism's "axis of evil." The terminology was not merely rhetorical. The president actually identified the dots of that axis and then joined them: Iraq, Iran and North Korea. He put the leaders of those countries on notice that the United States will no longer merely react to situations immediately after they have become threats to international peace and security, but rather will try to prevent them before they threaten the world.

"We cannot stop short," President Bush said. "If we stopped now, leaving terror camps intact and terror states unchecked, our sense of security would be false and temporary."

Again during the course of the week, after the Tuesday night speech before the joint houses of Congress and the world, Bush repeated this warning.

"Make no mistake about it," the president emphatically told Iraq, Iran and North Korea, "if you threaten us with weapons of mass destruction, if you threaten our allies and friends with weapons of mass destruction, we will do whatever it takes to protect our people."

The statement was remarkable for its own sake as an unambiguous declaration of resolve. But it was even more remarkable as an unambiguous declaration of support for Israel.

The president's declaration was criticized in certain quarters, particularly in Europe. Some people criticized the substance of the remarks. Some criticized the strategic or practical wisdom of uttering them so publicly.

To his credit, however, while he caviled somewhat at the phraseology "axis of evil," Deputy Canadian Prime Minister John Manley did support President Bush's overall message to the terrorism-exporting states.

"We deplore terrorism and we denounce governments who use terrorist groups to further political objectives or develop weapons of mass destruction," Manley told reporters. Then, commenting on the specific terminology "evil," Manley said: "I don't think there's any question that the victims of terrorist acts see those acts as evil and they would say that states that help them or encourage them or sponsor them are participating in acts of evil."

As the National Post pointed out, Manley did not disassociate himself from President Bush's newly-articulated policy.

It has been a long time since the issue has been drawn so starkly by any western government for terrorists and their sponsoring states.

There will be severe consequences – not only at the hands of the Israel Defence Forces but now, too, at the hands of the United States – for anyone attempting to strike down the Jewish State.

To be sure, Bush's "evil axis" doctrine brings its own dangers for Israel. We know from history that Saddam Hussein will launch his deadly missiles at Israel if he feels personally at risk. But we also know that he would seize upon most any pretext to do so or to support surrogates to do so.

Ultimately, however, Israel's security will have been enhanced by the President Bush's doctrine. But it is a doctrine only the United States could articulate. And that is one of the consequences of the difference between Canada and the United States we can cheer, not lament.

School board won't distribute newsletter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A teachers' union local that published a newsletter blaming Israel and the United States for much of the Middle East's conflicts and ills will have to find a new way to distribute it.

Last week, the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) announced it would no longer include D12 Voice in its internal courier service to 6,500 public high school teachers around the city.

The administrative decision, made by the board's executive, came as a response to concerns that the article was one-sided and touted by the newsletter as a classroom teaching aid.

"They (the board executive) had tremendous concerns about the article and asking teachers to teach material that wasn't balanced," said school trustee Gerri Gershon.

In December, Gershon tabled a motion calling on the school board to stop distributing the newsletter, to dissociate itself from it and reject suggestions it be used as a learning resource.

Although the board has yet to vote on the motion, TDSB chair Donna Cansfield read a statement saying the board "does not condone any type of unbalanced information presented in any classroom."

At the same time, the executive officer for the TDSB's programs and services sent an e-mail to the city's school principals asking them to remind teachers to stick to strict guidelines on the use of unattributed and one-sided resource material in class.

And in a memo late last year to Toronto members of the union, District 12 president Jim McQueen pointed out the "D12 Voice does not reflect the policies and opinions of...[District 12]."

The one-page article that caused the stir is a reprint from Z Magazine, an American left-wing monthly. Titled Why America is Hated, the article chronologically lists events that purportedly explain "a deep seated sense of injustice in the Arab and Islamic worlds against the U.S.A."

The article begins in 1948 with the creation of Israel as the first item prompting Arab grievances. It ends with the use by Israel of U.S. arms "in attempt to crush Palestinian uprising, killing hundreds of civilians." The article doesn't mention Israeli or U.S. peacemaking efforts or Palestinian actions against Israel.

Gershon said she believes most of the board supports the decision by its executive to end distribution of the newsletter, though a legal question remains whether District 12 will launch a grievance against the board's action.

The union's collective agreement allows the union to use the courier system, she acknowledged, though at the time the contract was concluded, the board thought the materials would focus on union issues, "to inform teachers on items that were being negotiated."

Doug Little, editor of D12 Voice, said the decision to withhold courier services was made unilaterally by a single official and was not mandated by the board.

Even if the board does vote to back the decision, it would violate the collective agreement. "It's like management censoring a union publication," he said.

McQueen said he has been trying to defuse the situation so "everyone can just get on with life."

The union believes D12 Voice should have indicated the source of the article, presented a context for it and printed a balancing article. He said the newsletter has agreed to do so in a future edition.

Nevertheless, he believes the TDSB acted outside the collective agreement and the union might yet grieve the decision. Noting the decision was made by a bureaucrat, "I'm wondering where the politicians stand on this matter," McQueen said.

Meanwhile, Earl Manners, head of the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation (OSSTF), told the Toronto Star the union is reviewing the use of its name and logo on D12Voice.

Little said Manners' response did not surprise him. District 12 has often found itself at odds with the provincial umbrella group on a number of issues. "Sometimes things happen in Toronto first. Politically, people are tougher," he said.

Pointing to a recent district council meeting where two North York teachers asked that District 12 retract, and apologize for, the article, Little said only a handful of (more than 200) members supported their motion.

Most union members either don't care about the article or "at least agree with the right to print it." The article "was presented because all we get from the media is the other side. It was presented in order to bring in an unbalanced debate into balance," he said.

Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the board's decision "reinforces the message that [the article] should not be used as teaching materials."

Corporal Punishment:
Who pays the consequences?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Superior Court recently upheld a provision in the Canadian Criminal Code allowing the use of force by teachers in the classroom under certain circumstances.

Section 43 of the code states that "every school teacher, parent or person standing in the place of a parent is justified in using [reasonable] force by way of correction toward a pupil."

Child advocates note that by upholding this provision, the courts have confirmed the position that there is a group in society that you can legally hit.

Cheryl Milne, a lawyer with the Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law, challenged the constitutionality of the section, noting that most states in the United States and all European countries, including England, have already outlawed corporal punishment in schools.

The government of Canada defended the law in court and was supported by the intervention of the Canadian Teachers' Federation.

There were a number of positive findings in the recent judgment, Milne said: it stated unequivocally that physical punishment is bad, it outlawed the use of implements when applying force and stated that you cannot hit a child under the age of two or a teenager.

However, Milne is disappointed that the court didn't find that the use of corporal punishment is illegal, thereby recognizing that children have rights.

"Children are vulnerable members of the community and it is our belief that they must be protected with more rights – not less – than adults."

While the Ontario Ministry of Education has implemented a Code of Conduct against violence that affects all public schools, Milne pointed out there are no consequences for teachers.

In effect, she noted, the only course of action for public school parents when faced with a teacher who has hit their child is to complain to the Ontario College of Teachers, which regulates and governs the teaching profession in this province.

In the private school system, it is up to individual schools to institute their own guidelines and policies regarding the use of force in the classroom.

Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, a former principal and current director of development at Eitz Chaim Day Schools, said that corporal punishment has not been allowed at Eitz Chaim since 1962.

"It is my view, as a teacher and educator," Rabbi Jacobovits said, "that punishments do not help in a classroom and that a teacher who can handle a class without punishment is a much more successful teacher."

However, he noted, "not all teachers, or parents, are competent enough to control classes through peaceful means.

"And while I am against all hitting, I am also against the law getting involved where it shouldn't."

There is a big difference between discipline and abuse, Rabbi Jakobovits said, and laying criminal charges against a teacher for hitting a child in a classroom would be excessive.

If schools were forced to call in police every time a teacher was suspected of hitting a child, it would ruin many teachers' lives long before anything is proven, he said.

In addition, forcing administrators to call the police in response to every student complaint would put a weapon in the hands of children, which could be highly detrimental to the functioning of a school, Rabbi Jacobowits said.

Schools may begin "covering up" situations in order to protect their teachers, the rabbi added. Ultimately, the law would ruin many lives without protecting those children who are really being abused.

According to Ronda Bessner, a legal and policy consultant who teaches in this field at the University of Toronto, there are many problems with the law the way it stands.

First of all, it is too vague, she said. The code simply states that force can be used as long as it "does not exceed what is reasonable in the circumstances."

However, it does not define what is reasonable, and judges wind up coming to different conclusions based on their own upbringing, she said. Furthermore, having a legal justification for hitting legitimizes the use of a course of action in a classroom which is detrimental in many respects.

In effect, Bessner said, the only benefit to hitting is short term compliance.

Watching teachers hit children in a classroom teaches children to resolve conflicts by force rather than by seeking alternatives which are far more effective, she stated.

It is important that all teachers be taught alternative ways to respond to disciplinary situations. A child's sense of security and self esteem are put in danger when they are subjected to disciplinary tactics that are inappropriate, Bessner said.

Gift of Life Bone Marrow Registry

Each year, thousands are stricken with diseases such as leukemia and told that the only hope of survival is a bone marrow transplant. Since tissue type is inherited, a patient's best chance of finding a genetically matched donor lies with those of similar ethnic ancestry.

For patients of Jewish heritage, finding a match is no easy task. Jews are under-represented in the worldwide donor pool, in part due to the tragedy of the Holocaust.

Established in 1991, the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation is a non-profit organization with a mission to increase the representation of the Jewish people in the international donor pool. Gift of Life started as a grass roots campaign to find a match for New Jersey resident Jay Feinberg, but quickly evolved into a mission to save many.

Drives organized on behalf of Jay and numerous other patients have registered over 100,000 donors and facilitated transplants for over 400 patients worldwide! Thanks to the kindness of a stranger, Jay's life was saved, and Gift of Life's mission continues as a valuable resource for world Jewry.

Gift of Life is a Public Registry, a member of the World Marrow Donor Association and a participant in the international network, Bone Marrow Donors Worldwide.

Visit www.bmdw.org or www.giftoflife.org for details on how you too can participate in the mitzvah of pikuach nefesh.

Israel's double dilemma

Last week an ad appeared in some Israeli newspapers; it was signed by some 100 reserve officers in the IDF protesting their government's policies against the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza and openly proclaiming their refusal to serve in the territories.

The decision to "go public" with their moral dilemma was undoubtedly a difficult one for the signatories. It was, we believe, a sincere act of conscience, independent of any political affiliations or considerations.

No one can gainsay the unpleasant, even repugnant, nature of having to police a people who do not wish to be policed, of having to impede other people's free travel from one place to another, of offending other people's dignity at virtually every turn.

When one adds to the inherently distasteful nature of the policing duties, the deep divide of distrust and worse that separates the two contending peoples, the irreversible life-and-death consequences accompanying a failure of policing and the fact that most of the IDF soldiers who are the "policemen" are themselves barely out of high school, it is not surprising that excesses of force by the young soldiers occasionally take place. Though abhorrent, these excesses are the exception; they are not the norm. And they are investigated and dealt with whenever brought to light.

But it is not the excesses alone that the reserve officers protest. It is the policing assignment itself and some of the orders attendant upon the assignment that evoke their cries. Already exploited as a propaganda coup by many of Israel's foes, the officers' complaints must be dealt with in a manner that responds to the bona fides of their pleas while preserving the integrity of the structure of military command.

The IDF executes the policies of the government. The government, duly elected and civilian, formulates those policies. This distinction is sacrosanct in every democracy on earth. Government policy relating to security and defence matters always takes into account the recommendations of the military. But there are clearly defined, appropriate channels for influencing government policy. The pages of the newspapers or the television studio are not among those channels for reserve officers of any army of any democracy.

In truth, the officers' moral dilemma is also Israel's dilemma. Israel also criticizes, even condemns, its need to police the Palestinian people in the territories. In the circumstances, however, it feels it has no choice. The officers obviously disagree with this assessment. But it is a disagreement that should be discussed and debated in the political institutions of society, not in the military.

The IDF has announced it will meet with each officer who signed the letter of protest. If the officer cannot retract his refusal to serve in the territories, he will be removed from combat command and reassigned to other reserve duty. If the officer refuses the reassignment, he will be punished according to military norms.

The IDF can do no less. Nor would any other military in any other democracy.

Lockshin responds to critics

I read with interest the reactions (CJN, Jan. 31) to my article "The Messiah Controversy" (CJN, Jan. 17). The authors said my article was not newsworthy, either because the Second Coming messianists constitute a small fringe movement, because there is nothing wrong with such messianism or because there are more crucial issues than this one.

Rabbi David Berger's recent book (The Rebbe, the Messiah, and the Scandal of Orthodox Indifference) has convinced me that Second Coming messianism has no place in Orthodox Judaism. The Rabbinical Council of America – the largest and most influential Orthodox rabbinical body in North America – has endorsed his position. The book has also convinced me that belief in Second Coming messianism is not limited to some tiny fringe group within the Lubavitch movement. Readers of The CJN can peruse the book, weigh that evidence against the arguments and reach their own conclusions.

In my neighbourhood in Toronto, there is a Lubavitch synagogue where the Yechi adonenu prayer ("May our Master, Teacher and Rabbi, the King Messiah, live forever") has become part of the liturgy. If this synagogue were simply a small group of fringe Jews doing something anomalous, perhaps it would not be newsworthy. But it reaches out to attract Jews of all stripes to a new form of Judaism that includes references to a dead person whom they consider the messiah. Canadian Jews should be aware that outreach of this nature is occurring.

I am sad that a wonderful group like Lubavitch – which has done so much to advance the cause of Torah Judaism – is either unwilling or unable to rid itself of this faction. At best, non-messianists proudly proclaim that Rabbi Berger's book "will have no impact on Chabad's work." At worst, they indulge in a mind-boggling, vilification campaign. (An article in the Allgemeiner Journal of Jan. 18 argued that Rabbi Berger was the ultimate spiritual cause of the events of Sept. 11!)

Is Second Coming messianism the biggest problem facing Judaism today? Hardly. But it is newsworthy, as the number and urgency of the responses to my article prove.

No matter how you look at it, The CJN has provided a very important service to the community. If Rabbi Berger and I are right, then CJN readers deserve to know about the messianist problem. If Rabbi Berger and I are wrong, then it is important that CJN readers have a chance to read Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet's spirited, articulate and nuanced defence of Lubavitch against the charges in Rabbi Berger's book.

The Gift of Life

I am writing in response to your recent article "Wanted: bone marrow donor" (CJN, Jan. 31). It is because of my own experience as a transplant recipient that I can appreciate Dr. Sheffield's frustration. However, his comments about the Jewish community, bone marrow donation, the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Registry and about me in particular are unfair and untrue.

The facts and figures quoted in the article concerning the international donor pool and retention rates are inaccurate. To begin, there is no private bone marrow registry – it is a public resource available to patients worldwide. Registered donors are available to patients of all socio-economic backgrounds through the international network, Bone Marrow Donors Worldwide. This global partnership of 49 public registries co-ordinates a database of 7.5 million donors in 39 countries. Transplant co-ordinators need only search one worldwide system to access all donors simultaneously, making it the single greatest resource for patients in need. Indeed, numerous volunteers tested on my behalf in Toronto have donated bone marrow to other patients over the years. We are taught that the mitzvah of pikuach nefesh is the greatest gift one human being can give to another.

The drives before and since my transplant have registered over 100,000 Jewish donors, facilitating over 400 transplants for children and adults around the world. The Gift of Life Bone Marrow Registry is a non-profit organization with a mission to increase the representation of the Jewish people in the international donor pool. Gift of Life is a public registry, a member of the World Marrow Donor Association and a participating registry in Bone Marrow Donors Worldwide. Its file is searched daily, free of charge, by transplant centres throughout the world. Because of its educational programs, Gift of Life's retention rate is among the highest in the world – 98 per cent of donors elect to proceed when called as a match. Its co-ordinators advocate for patients' rights, treating them with the dignity and respect they deserve.

Since tissue type is inherited, a patient's best chance of finding a genetic match lies with those of similar ethnic ancestry. For patients of Jewish heritage, finding a bone marrow match is no easy task because we are under-represented in the worldwide donor pool. It is evident that world Jewry is determined to help. In the past month alone, we have registered over 12,000 new potential donors – members of the Jewish community dedicated to the prospect that one person can make a difference in this world. Gift of Life's mission is based on the talmudic imperative: "He who saves one life, it is as if he had saved the entire world."

I encourage CJN readers to visit Bone Marrow Donors Worldwide (www.bmdw.org), the World Marrow Donor Association (www.worldmarrow.org) and the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Registry (www.giftoflife.org) for more details.

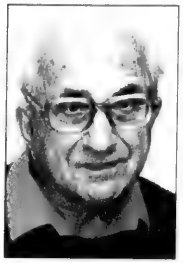
Perspectives

From Halle to Toronto to Jerusalem: reflections

I used to joke about my birthday: "Three disasters happened on June 22, the fall of France, the invasion of Russia, both in World War II, and my birth." However, 1916, the year of it, had been serious. They say the 20th century has been short, beginning in 1914 with the "Great War," and ending in 1989 with the collapse of communism; but, as philosopher Georg Hegel said, happy are blank pages in history, for nothing happens in them.



By Emil L. Fackenheim

On Jan. 31, 1933, Adolf Hitler's first day in power, I walked to school with Juergen Wenzlau, my best friend, who tried to comfort me: "The Nazis can make trouble in the streets but cannot run the country; they will be through in six weeks." I still remember his "six weeks" – sadly, for Juergen was killed on the Russian front. German Jews were not the only ones to err about Hitler, German gentiles, such as Juergen, did so more than I.

Neither the day nor the year of my birth was my choice; but a choice was forced on me by the year. Had I been born 10 years earlier, I would have studied with "existentialist" philosopher Martin Heidegger, but in 1935, when I finished high school, Hitler had been in power for two years, and I just had to find out what Jews and their religion – demonized by Julius Streicher, Joseph Goebbels and Hitler himself – really were. So I enrolled in Berlin's Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums. About 100 others had done the same, all studying-while-waiting, either for emigration or for Hitler's regime to collapse.

But for some of us the choice was "existential," and the waiting was for a "decision." What is meant by "existential decision" will appear in context.

We studied with Rabbi Leo Baeck, who influenced me through the way he lived, for he had vowed to stay in Germany with Jews without a chance to get out. Another professor, Max Wiener, influenced me by the way he made me think, and a third professor who was important to me was Moshe Sister. If Rabbi Baeck and Wiener tried to rescue our Jewish faith, even under Nazism, Sister tried to rescue us from it, for he taught higher biblical criticism – once called by Solomon Schechter "higher anti-Semitism" – as well as Tanach, and did so as the Marxist that he was.

I once got into an argument with Sister that lasted almost a whole class hour, with him asserting that a biblical text was corrupt, and me defending its integrity. Finally he hollered, "Use your reason, and you will see the text is corrupt!" "Perhaps my reason is corrupt," I replied. This "obscurantism" left Sister speechless, while I had yet to learn better ways to defend the existential philosophy of Martin Buber and Franz Rosenzweig.

To get back to Wiener: "How can Jews keep their Holy Writ just for themselves, while Christians seek to share their 'good news' with the world?" Wiener asked us to think about this for the next week's class, but – this is the way a good philosopher taught me to think – I thought about it for the rest of my life.

In a way, Wiener's question had already been answered in my bar mitzvah lessons, by Rabbi Albert Kahlberg in my hometown of Halle, when he called Christianity and Islam "daughter-religions" of Judaism, but this had been at the price of a painful question: Why are the "daughters" so ignorant of the "mother," or worse, even hate her? Now Jews ask this less about the one – for after Hitler, Christians were taught to end "teaching contempt for Judaism" – and more about "Islamism," part and parcel of the other.

To study in Berlin had been my first existential decision; what happened to Sister led to the second. Sister had a Polish passport and, without warning, the Nazi regime expelled him and all other Polish Jews to Poland. This expulsion led ultimately to Kristallnacht, on Nov. 9-10, 1938 – in my view, the beginning of the Holocaust. The Germans had not even let Sister take a suitcase, and my friend Heinz Fischel and I packed one and tried to find him in one of Berlin's train stations.

The confused, frightened Jews we saw made us realize that the time of study-and-wait was over, that there was need for a decision, and ours would be "existential." We would not flee just anywhere, as the Nazis wanted us to, but respond to the catastrophe as Jews, either by rebuilding Jewish life in Palestine or by building Jewish thought in America. (Palestine was for A. D. Gordon's Erloesung durch Arbeit,"redemption [of the Land] through labour;" later the land would be for defending the Jewish State.)

Even so, while we knew we had to leave, where could we go? Was there anywhere? We applied to Hebrew University, but the British authorities would not let us into Palestine. Choosing the United States would mean waiting for two years, and everybody knew Canada was out.

Fischel and I got together with Manfred Braeude, and we wrote letters to 10 American universities, asking for scholarships and visitors' visas. I mailed the last of these a few days before Kristallnacht.

I will skip Kristallnacht, my three months in a concentration camp, my flight to Scotland, internment in Britain and Canada, my life in Israel and reaction to "Oslo," and go on with this story: why did I move from Toronto to Jerusalem? But first I must tell how Toronto became "home," or as much so as was possible.

When I was released from Canadian internment on Dec. 14, 1941, I got an appointment the next day with G. S. Brett, the head of University of Toronto's philosophy department and dean of its graduate school, and said, "The academic year is half over, and I cannot expect credit for the year, but being late is not my fault." Brett replied, "You can show [us] what you can do." I went on: "I have no academic degree, but Aberdeen University let me do graduate studies because of my rabbinical diploma." Brett replied: "What is good enough for Aberdeen is good enough for us." I felt I had never left home.

I will also skip my five years as a Reform rabbi in nearby Hamilton. For nearly 40 years, the U of T philosophy department was home, or as much as it was possible to be. F. H. Anderson, Brett's successor, followed Brett in the policy that philosophers must study not the latest, but the greatest, and for me, among moderns, greatest is Hegel.

Fackenheim and Will Herberg

But between 1967 and 1983, home was no longer Toronto but, as it were, "between Toronto and Jerusalem," and in these years, our third "existential decision" also took place. I say "our" because I married Rose Komlodi in 1957. Before Rose and I met, she and her friend Shirley had spent a year in Europe, trying to find out how fellow-Christians could have perpetrated the Holocaust, but had come back without answer. Rose was converted to Judaism by an Orthodox beit din, but only when we were in Israel – "when it was for real," she said. Rose died in 1998.

Our "decision" began in 1967, when Israel was encircled by Egypt, Syria, even Jordan, when Colonel Gamal Abdul Nasser closed the Gulf of Aqaba, a casus belli in any "just war" theory. Since 1956, the UN had been in the region to keep the peace; yet when in 1967, Nasser said, "go away," away they went. True, the UN voted in 1947 for two states, one Jewish, one Arab, but in 1967, its behaviour was different, and Israel not only felt abandoned, but was. Canada behaved too much like the UN. It behaves too much like the UN even now, for when the United States walked out of the UN conference on racism this past fall in Durban, South Africa, for tolerating not only anti-Zionism but open anti-Semitism, Canada stayed.

Just before we left Canada in 1983, Will Herberg, a one-time comrade-in- arms and author of Protestant, Catholic, Jew, lectured at U of T. But when he said that by the logic of their convictions, secular Jews should cease to be Jews, I rose in protest:

"What about Auschwitz? Jerusalem? What about secular Jews needing a Jewish state, or secular Jews in the United States and the rest of the free world standing up for it?"

Herberg replied that he stayed with the written and oral Torah, that he had no use for novelties.

But for Rose and me, Auschwitz and Jerusalem had long ceased to be novelties.

I mention two lectures I gave at Hebrew University. In my first, I waved papers at my students, many of them German, saying that I had made it at last. I didn't make it as a student in 1939, but as a professor in 1983, and it was in Jerusalem, although, alas, as everybody knows, these are not messianic times.

The other lecture was on Jewish philosophy. I finished by quoting medieval poet-philosopher Yehuda Halevi, that Jerusalem would be redeemed only if Jews loved her stones and dust. They were building then at Hebrew University, and there were stones and dust everywhere. I said: "What are you waiting for? There is plenty of dust, there are plenty of stones." Then I walked out.

Precious memories

Back in the early 1930s, when the Nazis destroyed my budding law career, my father suggested that I occupy myself with Jewish studies. In order to fortify my rather weak Jewish knowledge, he engaged a young man who was reputed to be not only a good teacher but also widely learned. The young man turned out to be none other than Abraham Joshua Heschel, who taught me privately for some years and, in time, became one of the great Jewish figures of the century.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This memory comes to mind because just now we are about to celebrate a significant anniversary. Fifty years ago, Rabbi Heschel published his first path-breaking book. It was called The Sabbath. Such were his persuasive powers that a subject that had previously received very little attention suddenly moved into the limelight.

In America, Heschel later found himself at the centre of attention when he joined Martin Luther King in the Selma March when – as he called it – he prayed with his legs. At the time, King's campaign was geared to the spreading opposition against the Vietnam War and Heschel became the honorary chair of the "Trees for Vietnam" organization, which sent money to the Vietnamese to replant trees that were being destroyed in the war.

A recent clip on the Internet asked this question: Is there any connection between the Heschel of The Sabbath and the Heschel of Selma, that is, his opposition to the Vietnam War?

It goes on to say: "The Heschel who greeted the world with 'radical amazement' and expressed a lyrical, mystical and persuasive love of Shabbat, and the Heschel who disobeyed the law for the sake of peace, life and justice, were one and the same dynamo. It was he who once said that Shabbat is not only a day on which we use no money, and, instead, call for an armistice in the economic struggle with our fellow human beings and the forces of nature, it is also an institution that holds out the greatest hope for progress by being a resting point for the human soul."

Years after Heschel wrote this, his book The Sabbath moved many hearts, minds and souls, but, as my readers will well know, the battle has not yet been won. Shabbat remains in opposition to an all-encompassing social ethic that makes work a quasi-religious activity. The blessings Shabbat brings are unique, and it is sad to say that all too many Jews never come to know them. Physical health has moved to the centre of our concerns, displacing the care for our soul. We need them both, which means that we are incomplete or unbalanced when we try to face life's challenges with only one half of our potential.

Morning in Israel

We will be going to Israel in May, seeing first-hand the tensions under which Israelis are living. Friends who have been to Israel tell us how grateful Israelis are for visitors – "How brave you are to come," many exclaim. Visitors' response is always "No, you are the brave ones, who live under constant shadows of terror." In order to match the persistence of Israel, we overseas should be traveling this summer in great numbers – and making Israel our destination.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Indeed we who visit, while welcome, are not the brave ones; it is Israelis, living with the constant threat of suicide bombers, who are the bravest. Not many tourists can be found on the streets of Jerusalem – they are usually parents visiting their children – although the country anticipates that aliyah from Argentina will rise due to the economic crisis in that country.

Israel is a nation accustomed to dealing with the constant threat of terrorist attacks. Israelis are resolute and strong in the face of this adversity. Life is continuing with a powerful realization of the significance of Jewish survival in our homeland. Israelis are living life more fully than ever before, cognizant of their historic role in the preservation of our Jewish state, a vibrant, inspirational and exciting country. A visit to Israel now will be inspiring for all Jews in the Diaspora and will help to raise the spirits and improve the economy of the state.

I want to introduce someone who knows first-hand the challenge of today's Israel. Danielle Ames is a student at a yeshiva in Jerusalem. She and other friends from Vancouver elected to go for their year abroad, despite the "situation" and with the blessings of the community. Danielle has a luminous and compelling love of Torah. Recently she sent this message, which glows with hope. When I am depressed, I read it, and now I share it with you. Danielle writes:

"I had the most beautiful experience this morning. The girls in my Gemorah shiur woke early and went to the Kotel to daven at Vatikin (sunrise) on completion of learning the area in Gemarah Brachot dealing with the time of prayer. Technically, the word Vatikin refers to the talmidei chachamim who would also wake early in the morning in order to daven the Amidah exactly at sunrise, the first possible moment in the day the Amidah may be said. This tradition has evolved and currently is practiced all around the world, most significantly at the Kotel.

"Imagine the sky at the sight of dawn. Imagine a cool quiet breeze. Imagine a small, but diligent crowd of observant Jews from every walk of life. This was the serene setting at the Kotel this morning. Vatikin has become a symbol of redemption and hope. Just as the sun begins to shine, God's light and presence is reflected in this world. How appropriate it is, that the moment we pray for the redemption of Israel, sun breaks through the darkness as rays of hope. Traditionally, throughout the history of Judaism, darkness has always represented times of turmoil, uncertainty and fear. It is at the time of utter subservience to God, that we cry out for assistance, and we are reassured by the rising of the sun. An indication of a new day, new potential and new prospects. In times of darkness, Jews have no choice but to turn to God and pray to him for assistance and salvation.

"As I concluded the Amidah, I heard a beautiful voice calling out from the other side of the mechitzah. When I looked over, I cried. Standing there was a young soldier in uniform, with his gun around one shoulder and his sleeve neatly rolled up on the other side. His worn tfillin were wrapped around his arm, and he held his siddur in the other. With his beautiful voice he was crying to God for relief, guidance, and the ultimate redemption. That soldier captured the essence of Vatikin in my eyes, as well as the concept to have trust in God, as well as to have enough faith to take the appropriate actions. This morning I learned that one cannot merely believe that God has everything in order and do nothing further, but one must seek justice and truth and turn to God amidst times of darkness, for support, and maybe even a miracle."

What stories will we tell?

The old saying, "Don't judge a book by its cover," has never been more appropriate.

The clunky bound volume I scanned last week has a wordless, imageless black cover, reminiscent of a graduate thesis or an old library book whose dust jacket has long ago turned to dust itself. It's nearly 600 pages thick, with text appearing only on the right-hand side. The guts of the book are photocopied; not too many pages look like other pages. Only a handful of copies were printed.

The humble structure of this book, however, belies the colourful treasure that lies within.

JWC Family Stories: 2000-2001 is the brainchild of Sheldon Oberman, a teacher at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC), Winnipeg's Jewish high school. Oberman is also a prolific author, one who was shortlisted for the Governor General's Award last year for The Shaman's Nephew. (Less prominent on his c.v. is the fact that he was my teacher at JWC about 20 years ago.)

JWC Family Stories: 2000-2001 was launched as a project in December 2001 at the local Jewish book fair. Simply put, it is the collective work of about 90 students in grades 9 to 11. Each young author set out to record a piece of his or her family's history.

Grade 9 student Shauna Calnitsky wrote of her great-grandfather's dream of becoming a farmer. Too poor to pursue his dream in England where he lived, he became a craftsman to support his family. Morris Tennenhouse moved to Canada in 1904 to a free tract of land in Manitoba. The teenage writer skilfully describes the winter day when it was too cold to go outside and snow drifts reached the windows. Her great-grandfather Morris quickly carved a violin out of an apple crate and taught his children how to play. The writing is crisp and vivid. The reader can almost smell the gentle smoke of the wood stove in the prairie kitchen.

Grade 10 student Pam Kravetsky wrote of her great-grandparents who lived in Moscow while her great-grandfather, Sam Goodman, was a senior officer in the Czar's cavalry. Expecting a pogrom, Pam's great-grandmother, Sarah, sewed jewels into her three children's clothes so they could bribe their way into Canada. "Sarah and Sam knew they couldn't leave," wrote Pam of the pogrom, "so they told their children to run away as fast as they could. As the Russian army entered the front door, Norman and his sisters ran out the back. They got as far as the end of the block… Norman turned to look back one more time at his house, and was terrified as he saw his parents lying dead on the front steps."

Seeing a story like this one about the Goodmans in a published history text is one thing. Seeing it as a word-processed document produced by a local teen about her own family is quite another. And that's the true power of this book.

While the historical stories come from Latvia, Russia, Poland, South Africa, England, India, Germany, Israel and more, they're conveyed by today's teenagers. The stories are powerful snapshots of Jewish life. Some are tragic; some are funny. They all paint verbal portraits of remarkable people in remarkable times. But after reading a few of the entries, I found myself focusing less and less on the pogroms, heroics and tales of hardship. I found myself thinking about the authors.

I envisioned a 16-year-old sitting across the table from Baba in Winnipeg's River Heights, Garden City or Tuxedo. A lace tablecloth. A plate of kommish. A notepad. Maybe a tape recorder. The Baba gets a tear in her eye as she recalls a brother taken by the Nazis. The student, perhaps never having heard the full story before, struggles to find the balance between keeping eye contact with Baba while taking accurate notes for the school assignment. The conversation ends. The two hug and cry. Baba pushes one more piece of kommish on the young author. In a 30-minute conversation with Baba, the teenager is educated about Jewish history – and moved by it.

I find myself wondering, though: Now that we're safe and sound in Canada, with pogroms and persecution in our past, what will these teens' stories be for their descendants? What will mine be?

The Kirshner File

Wooden shuls inspired filmmaker's quest

On a visit to a second-hand bookshop in New York City in the early 1960s, Albert Barry bought Wooden Synagogues, a book by Polish architects Maria and Kazimierez Piechotka.

Published in Poland in 1959, the hardcover volume contained rare pre-war photographs of centuries-old wooden synagogues in Eastern Europe.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Prior to their virtual destruction by the Nazis, these barn-like structures, with their soaring multi-tiered roofs, vaulted ceilings, ornately-carved bimahs and beautifully painted walls, were masterpieces of craftsmanship and synagogue architecture.

"I was enthralled," said Barry, a graphic designer, photographer and filmmaker. "Until I saw that book, I never knew anything about wooden synagogues."

So enchanted was he by these buildings, redolent of a bygone era eradicated by Hitler, that he purchased 49 glass slides of vanished wooden synagogues from the Polish Academy of Sciences in Warsaw.

With these as his inspiration, he proceeded to build 1/12-scale electrified wooden models of the shuls, the defining structures of Jewish communities in the fabled shtetl.

Eventually, Barry, who now lives in the Fort Lauderdale, Fla., suburb of Sunrise, donated his unique collection of hand-carved wooden synagogues to Florida Atlantic University in Boca Raton, a Canadian snowbirds' paradise.

But Barry, a first-generation American who recently turned 75, was not finished with his pet project, which some have described as an obsession.

In 1993, Eliza Cohen, a Hebrew University specialist in Jewish art, visited Lithuania and stumbled upon six wooden synagogues, supposedly the only ones left in the world.

She contacted him and a correspondence ensued. Having received her photographs of wooden synagogues, Barry showed them to seven Jews in New York City and Delray Beach, Fla., who, incredibly enough, had once worshipped in such shuls.

Fired up by the photographs, Barry decided to make a documentary about wooden synagogues, some 1,000 of which once dotted Eastern Europe's rural landscape.

With the financial support of the Molly S. Frailberg Judaica Collections at Florida Atlantic University and of Nathan and Marion Crosby, Barry and a film crew, including his wife Kathy, went to Lithuania – and Latvia – in 1999.

Their 48-minute movie, The Lost Wooden Synagogues of Eastern Europe, comes in English, Yiddish and Hebrew versions. It was premiered in Florida last winter.

He claims that it is the only film of its kind on the subject. In October, Barry brought it here for Holocaust Education Week.

Narrated by folksinger Theodore Bikel, The Lost Wooden Synagogues of Eastern Europe is a melange of archival and contemporary footage and of interviews with Holocaust survivors and with Florida Atlantic University historian Henry Abrams, formerly of Toronto.

It is a poignant reminder of an obliterated epoch.

A wooden synagogue, destroyed during the Holocaust, in Grodno, Poland.

The shuls themselves, in some cases, were hand-hewn by local craftsmen, and showed Moorish and Byzantine influences.

They served a multitude of purposes. Apart from being places of worship, they were seats of learning and hubs of social activity. In every instance, they formed the heart of Jewish communities.

Wood was the material of choice in the countryside because it was cheap, accessible and unostentatious. For these reasons, too, Catholic churches were also made of wood.

The exteriors of the wooden synagogues were plain, though, inevitably, some resembled Chinese pagodas.

The interiors were magnificent.

Walls and ceilings were painted with arabesque and floral designs, entwined with zodiac calendars, biblical creatures and tablets, and crowned by Hebrew lettering.

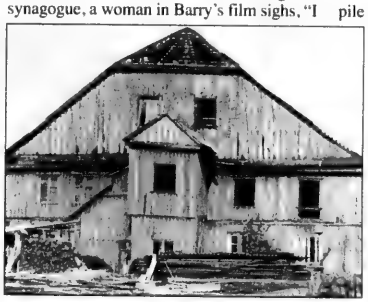
Albert Barry

World War II doomed these sanctuaries, most of which were found in Poland, with 3.3 million Jews. Today, there are none in Poland.

Such was their fame that Napoleon once paid a visit to a wooden synagogue.

In line with their rabid anti-Semitic philosophy, the Nazis looted and burned them as they ruthlessly murdered their Jewish congregants.

Having borne witness to the torching of a synagogue, a woman in Barry's film sighs, "I felt like I'm dying."



The remains of a wooden synagogue in Seda, Lithuania.

During the Communist era, which stretched from 1945 to 1991, the few remaining wooden synagogues untouched by the Germans were converted into storehouses, stables and manufacturing plants.

Never properly maintained, they fell into disrepair.

When Barry finally set eyes on these architectural marvels, he was visibly excited. "I've waited 35 years!" he exclaims in his film, his joy pouring out.

During the course of his trip, a veritable journey back in time, he discovered four additional wooden synagogues the Hebrew University researcher had missed, including the last remaining one in Latvia.

All are in lamentable condition, or as Henry Abrams puts it, "empty husks."

Barry, whose parents hailed from Poland and Ukraine and immigrated to the United States at the beginning of the 20th century, is far blunter.

"There's no money, or interest, to rebuild them. They're rotting away. At this rate, they may not endure for many more winters."

Barry gained entry to their gloomy interiors by climbing through broken widows or breaking locks on doors.

In one decrepit shul, Barry stepped into a pile of manure, and in another, he nearly fell two stories through loose flooring. In a third synagogue, he spied two grimy, forgotten wooden Stars of David in a battered window frame. It made his day.

A dearth of government funding means that only one of nine wooden synagogues in Lithuania has been placed on a list of historic buildings to be preserved.

Officially, the synagogues are the property of the Jewish community. But since local Jews do not have the means to maintain them, they remain legally unclaimed.

Barry, whose freelance photographs have graced the pages of national magazines like Time, Life and Look, disclosed that Jews in Berkeley, California, plan to build a replica wooden synagogue.

"It will be a live, working synagogue, not a museum."

The project is expected to cost $8 million. To date, $2.5 million has been raised.

Construction will begin when sufficient funds are available, said Barry, who is currently assembling data for a new documentary about Jewish music.

Once finished, the Berkeley synagogue will be the sole East European-style wooden synagogue in North America, as well as the only functioning one on this planet.

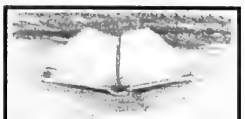
Jewish Life

Teaching by example

By RABBI RONALD WEISS



Rabbinic Reflections

In the Torah portion this week, Parshat Mishpatim, we hear what is perhaps the most famous response ever uttered by the Jewish people. We are told that Moses read the Torah, which had just been given, to the Jewish people and their immediate reply was, "Na'aseh v'nishmah" – we will do and we will obey the teachings of the Almighty (Exodus 24:7). This statement conveys the commitment and resolve of the people to adhere to whatever God would command of them and, arguably, explains the secret of our continued existence throughout two millennia of exile.

However, in last week's parshah, Parshat Yitro, when the Jewish people stood at the foot of Mt. Sinai and Moses put the words of the Torah before them, the verse says: "V'ya'anu kol ha'am yachdav v'yomru kol asher dibair HaShem na'aseh" – the entire people responded together and said, "Everything that the Almighty has spoken we will do" (Exodus 19:8).

Why does the response differ from one parshah to another? What can we learn from the language of the Torah?

Many years ago in yeshiva, I heard a beautiful answer from my teacher, Rabbi Nissan Alpert, of blessed memory. He said that each person is not able to fulfil all the Torah's 613 commandments. Some commandments, for example, apply only to a kohen, a priest officiating in a sacramental capacity, or to a Jewish king ruling his subjects. Other mitzvot are to be observed only in Israel.

Nevertheless, Rabbi Alpert said, there are two ways every Jew can fulfil all 613 commandments. The first way is through the talmudic concept, "Kol Yisrael areivin zeh b'zeh" – all Jews are involved with each other. Because all Jews have a sense of being connected with one another, what relates to one Jew pertains to others. This sense of involvement is often identified with communal responsibility, but the actual meaning of the talmudic teaching is that whatever applies to one Jew applies to all. Therefore, said Rabbi Alpert, the mitzvot that apply to one Jew, actually apply to everyone else as well, regardless of circumstance because they're part of the whole.

The second way every Jew can fulfil all 613 commandments is through a teaching found in the Mishnah. We are told, "Talmud Torah k'neged kulam" – the study of Torah is equivalent to its observance (Mishnah Peah 1:1). Therefore, even if the circumstances necessary for the performance of specific mitzvot are absent, we can still involve ourselves with their activity and sanctity by studying about them.

If we now look back at the verses from the Torah cited above, the distinction between them becomes clear. The verse from Parshat Yitro says: "V'ya'anu kol ha'am yachdav v'yomru kol asher dibair HaShem na'aseh" – the entire people responded together and said, "Everything that the Almighty has spoken we will do." When the Torah tells us "na'aseh," we will do, by itself, the verse emphasizes that the people responded together. This, explains Rabbi Alpert, is a reference to areivut, the concept of reciprocity, of being connected Jewishly with all Jews.

However, this week's parshah tells us that when the people heard Moses read the Torah, their reply was, "na'aseh v'nishmah" – we will do and we will obey. The addition of the word "v'nishmah," and we will obey, indicates that we will observe what we hear and we will do what we are taught. Rabbi Alpert emphasized that this is a clear indication of talmud Torah, the mitzvah of studying all the commandments.

Awareness of and sensitivity to the mitzvot are essential in maintaining our Jewish identity both as individuals and as part of the community. Areivut and talmud Torah speak to the values we seek to pass on to the next generation.

Judaism cannot survive in a vacuum; the only environment in which it can thrive – even under hardship – is that of a community. Yet a community, by definition, means being connected with others, having responsibilities that go beyond oneself and being sensitive to the impact the actions of every person has on those around them. However, before we can teach by example, we need to know what to teach. This is talmud Torah and it is the only way for us to learn about what in fact makes us Jewish.

Rabbi Weiss is director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto.

Birthright Israel

"Don't let this feeling die"

By MATTHEW CUTLER

Birthright Israel experience was truly a trip of a lifetime and I hope the bonds I made on the trip last as long.

I hope we keep the bonds we made with each other and never forget what we went through and with whom. But I somehow feel this trip was about a little more.

I feel completely honoured and privileged to have had an experience such as this one. We had the privilege of being on a free trip that normally would have cost more than $4,000. We were privileged to have great leaders. And we were privileged to be with one another.

The first couple of days after coming back, not being on a bus was very hard, although I didn't miss the wake-up calls. But I did miss the touring and the interaction with my bus-mates. We had some incredibly intense discussions, and while we may not have always agreed, we did agree to listen to each other and hear one another out. And it was great to get everyone involved and to hear such diverse perspectives from all across the spectrum. I miss the group and the interaction.

Some of us have gone back to work, some of us have gone back to school.

My first day back at work felt very weird. I like my job. But the challenges I faced in Israel are not the types of challenges I face at work.

There was a part of me that was awakened on this trip. I felt totally alive. Looking at the pictures from the trip, I appear more "alive" in those pictures than I have in a long time.

I found meaning on this trip.

I found Israel on this trip, connecting with the magic of that country, which for some of us seemed so unreachable before.

I am determined not to let that special feeling get away. Now, I am not saying we should all make aliyah, as much as our Israeli guide wanted us all to, but there are many ways we can and should connect to Israel.

The one message I learned from our time with the IDF soldiers and with our Israeli chovshim (medics) was this: If we in the Diaspora truly want to help, the best thing we can do is to educate ourselves, and thus help to educate the world, concerning what is truly going on in Israel and the dire situation the country is facing.

For those of us who aren't sure how or where to get involved, we can contact one of our madrichim (guides), who I'm sure will help us get in touch with the proper people.

We must not let this feeling die.

If this trip taught us anything it was to not stand idly by, but instead to become active any way we know how.

As our guide told us: "It truly is up to our generation to get things done."

Israel and the Winter Olympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In 1988, Jamaica caused a stir at the Calgary Olympics when the Caribbean island fielded a bobsled team. Not known for ice or subzero temperatures, Jamaica's entry made headlines around the world and inspired a movie [http://www.jamaicanbobsled.com/content.html].

Israel is another country not usually associated with winter sports. But thanks to emigration from the former Soviet Union and a strengthening infrastructure for winter sports, Israel is about to send off its third Winter Olympic delegation.

This year, five athletes will represent Israel in Salt Lake City. Galit Chait and Sergei Saknovsky are Israel's best ice dance couple [http://www.ice-dance.com/galit-sergei/]. Chait was born in Israel and grew up in New Jersey and Delaware. Saknovsky was born in Moscow and made aliyah in 1995. They placed 14th in Nagano in 1998 and a very impressive fifth in the Original Dance program at the European Championships in Lausanne, Switzerland, [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2002/01/18/Sports/Sports.41905.html].

Chait and Saknovsky will be joined in Salt Lake City by Israel's No. 2 ice dancers, the married duo of Natalia Gudina and Alexei Beletsky who emigrated from Ukraine two years ago [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2002/01/21/Sports/Sports.42013.html].

Rounding off the team is Olga Danilov who will compete in short track speed skating.

Israel's best known winter Olympian is Michael Shmerkin, the first Israeli to participate in the Winter Olympics. In Lillehammer, Norway, in 1994, Shmerkin finished a respectable 16th. Since then, his skating has been erratic. He recently placed an impressive fifth place at the Spin Competition at Zagreb, Croatia, but after he had a 25th place finish in Lausanne, organizers decided he would not be going to Salt Lake City [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/11/11/Sports/Sports.37861.html].

Israel's official Olympic Web site has a section in English detailing the country's history at the Games. At press time, it had not been updated to include information about the 2002 Olympics [http://olympic.achla.co.il/]. The Hebrew section also includes a tribute to the 11 Israeli athletes murdered at the 1972 Olympics in Munich [http://olympic.achla.co.il/yaindex.html].

Israel's representative on the International Olympic Committee is Alex Gilady a broadcasting executive in Israel and at NBC Sports [http://www.olympic.org/ioc/e/org/ioc/bio/bio25_e.html]. Gilady is also involved in a study looking at a possible Israeli bid for the 2012 Summer Olympics. Gilady acknowledges that it could be 20 to 30 years before the Games actually go to Israel and that a settlement of the Palestinian conflict is a "precondition" to Israel's candidacy [http://www.canoe.ca/Slam010926/oly_2012-ap.html].

As the world focuses on Salt Lake City, there will be plenty of coverage about Utah's Mormon heritage. The Jewish presence in Utah dates back 150 years to the early entrepreneurs who supplied itinerant miners hunting for gold. According to an article published in the Jerusalem Post, the state is now home to about 5,000 Jews [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/11/26/JewishWorld/JewishWorld.16268.html]. If you are planning to attend the Olympics and are looking for Jewish contacts, look at the comprehensive links provided by Hillel at the University of Utah [http://www.utah.edu/hillel/links.htm] and the Salt Lake City Jewish Community Center [http://www.slcjcc.org/links.htm].

No matter how well Israel fares in Salt Lake City, one town back home will be looking on with pride. The village of Metulla in the Galilee is Israel's northernmost Jewish community and is a training centre for many of Israel's winter athletes. In the late 1980s, Yossi Goldberg was mayor of Metulla and became the driving force behind the construction of the town's large recreational complex that includes two ice rinks [http://www.skate-israel.org/Metulla.htm]. Goldberg is now head of the Association of Winter Sports in Israel and is optimistic about Israel's chances in Salt Lake City. An Israeli medal would not only be a boost to Israel's winter sports industry. It would also put to rest comparisons to a certain country's bobsled team [http://www.cjnews.com/pastissues/00/nov16-00/international/int2.htm].

Varian Fry: an unrecognized hero

Books
Bernard Baskin

A Hero of Our Own: The Story of Varian Fry*, by Sheila Isenberg, Random House, $39.93.

The fall of France in 1940 posed an imminent threat to thousands of German, Italian and Polish opponents of National Socialism who had taken refuge in that country. They faced the imposition of the Final Solution by the Nazis.

In New York, an emergency rescue committee was formed – with Vichy approval – to provide minimal legal aid to these refugees. The committee sent Varian Fry, a 32-year-old political journalist, on a brief mission of a few weeks to assess the situation and to determine if some of the refugees, especially well-known intellectuals, could be helped to escape to Lisbon or Casablanca or other safe havens on their way to America.

But instead of a few weeks, Fry spent 13 months in Marseilles between 1940 and 1941, overcoming a variety of obstacles and conducting the most successful private rescue mission in World War II. He saved the lives of more than 1,500 men and women, including many whose legacy to the world is abiding: Marc Chagall, Max Ernst, Jacques Lipchitz, Marcel Duchamp, Hannah Arendt, Andre Breton, Alma and Franz Werfel, Lion Feuchtwanger and Arthur Koestler.

With no special training or experience, Fry was able to work around the Vichy authorities who co-operated with the Germans by refusing to issue exit visas. With a small group of loyal colleagues, he engaged in complex and illegal operations, mainly in smuggling refugees across borders. He provided forged documents for desperate men and women and arranged midnight escapes across the Pyrenees Mountains. In a dangerous game of spies and counter-spies, he discovered resources of courage and energy in himself he never knew existed.

The most difficult part of Fry's work was the agonizing process of selection. The demands made on him were tremendous. It is astonishing that about 15,000 refugees, half the number caught in Vichy, implored him for help. But only a few could be saved. Which ones? Who would live and who would die?

Forced to establish priorities, Fry favoured refugees who already possessed some of the necessary documents, those healthy enough to make the journey, and the intellectual and creative elite.

His devotion to his task was unending. He worked to the point of sheer exhaustion – and his zeal took on a religious or spiritual aura.

Back home, the emergency rescue committee became increasingly unhappy with Fry for his disdain for their authority, his restless intelligence and his quirky personality. But above all else, the American State Department applied unrelenting pressure on Fry to end his activities because they were creating tension between Vichy and Washington.

This biography indicates that Fry's earlier years were without promise and his return to the United States was marked by years of frustration and disappointment as he drifted from one inadequate job to another. He received almost no recognition for his accomplishments and, in time, became estranged from wife and children.

A Hero of Our Own is a straightforward, often absorbing account of how a seemingly ordinary person, thrown into a situation of danger and challenge, did extraordinary things.

Years after Fry's death, the American State Department apologized for its unseemly behaviour and a variety of tributes were offered in his memory. Fry, a Protestant, is the only American honoured at Israel's Memorial Museum and made an honorary citizen of the State of Israel in recognition of the life and death struggle he waged against the greatest evil of the 20th century.

"Suddenly Jewish: Jews Raised as Gentiles Discover Their Jewish Roots"

Tuesday, February 12, 2002 at 8:00 p.m.

Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street, Willowdale

When The Washington Post noted the Jewish ancestry of former U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, her professed ignorance of her heritage struck some observers as incredible. The resulting controversy inspired a surprising number of others, who had discovered belatedly their Jewish origins, to come forward with their stories.

Barbara Kessel has explored this phenomenon of Jews who were raised as gentiles but learned of their Jewish heritage later in life.

Drawing on interviews with over 160 people, Ms. Kessel tells their dramatic tales and the responses of her subjects. Much of her research is incorporated in her recently published study on this subject.

Joining Ms. Kessel to explore the phenomenon of finding oneself "suddenly Jewish" will be Dr. Anthony McFarlane and Yvonne Singer, two Canadians who discovered that they were "suddenly Jewish". They will share their experiences with us.

Beth Emeth gets new rabbi/educator

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Aubrey Glazer bends over a table in the library of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue (BEBY), retying the fringes of his tallit in accordance with a Sephardi custom that has been adopted by many Jewish mystics, while he discusses his particular Jewish outlook and his work at the shul and in the community.

Since he became Beth Emeth's synagogue educator and keruv (outreach) worker – a newly created part-time position – in November, the 31-year-old rabbi has incorporated his distinctive spiritual take on Judaism into his endeavours at the synagogue.

His first mandate at the 1,500-member shul is to do educational "inreach" with groups ranging from youth to seniors, from singles to young families, he told The CJN. One example is a lunch-and-learn program at a downtown law firm for BEBY members and friends.

He also continues to do the type of outreach work that he has been doing at a number of local Conservative congregations. Recently he was a facilitator for a creative environmental Shabbat program run by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

A perennial student with a BA in French language and literature and an MA in Jewish philosophy, Rabbi Glazer is also working on a PhD in Jewish thinking and poetics at the University of Toronto. He spent six weeks in Israel last summer studying contemporary Israeli poetry on a Charles and Andrea Bronfman Fellowship in Israeli Studies.

At Beth Emeth, where he spends 20 hours a week, Rabbi Glazer brings "a love of Judaism and a fresh approach," said shul president Ari (Phil) Hochman.

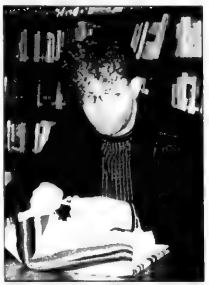
"We have a complementary approach," said the congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Howard Morrison.

When Rabbi Glazer was asked about his personal approach to Judaism (which is egalitarian) in the context of a traditional Conservative synagogue, he took the opportunity to share what he calls a teaching moment.

"We need each other's truths in order to get a bigger picture of Judaism overall," said Rabbi Glazer, who was ordained at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in 2000, and who has also been a student at Metivta: A Centre for Contemplative Judaism in Los Angeles for the past few years.

His penchant for embracing multiple philosophies is not just theoretical, the rabbi explained. In fact, he embodies it in a concrete way by following the chassidic custom of changing to a second set of tfillin part-way through morning prayers. Each set has the scrolls inserted differently, to commemorate an unresolved difference of opinion between the Jewish sages Rashi and his grandson Rabbeinu Tam.

The more familiar custom of placing a mezuzah diagonally, instead of vertically or horizontally, is a similar example, he said. "It's a question of awakening the awareness that Judaism is not about monolithic truths."



Rabbi Aubrey Glazer reties the fringes of his tallit. [Frances Kraft photo]

The rabbi spends two Shabbatot a month at Beth Emeth, running an intergenerational service that was instituted shortly before he took the new position. The 90-minute service, followed by a half-hour chassidic or inspirational-based shiur (lesson), focuses on the how and why of prayer.

Rabbi Glazer hopes it will "defrost" the prayer book for people who find themselves distanced from it.

He also teaches a Minchah shiur called Mystical Moments at Minchah, which looks at the mystical underpinnings of Halachah.

Recently he discussed gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness) and tikkun olam (repairing the world) at an orientation for a five-week Out of the Cold program for the homeless at Beth Emeth.

"I think people are hungry to connect to their Judaism," he said. "People are beginning to peel away at the layers and find different points of entry. My mandate is to open other doors."

One of those doors is a course he teaches at Beth Tzedec Congregation called The Tao of Judaism, which focuses on the Book of Kohelet as seen through a Taoist lens. The course title refers to a Chinese philosophy ("the way"), which is not in conflict with Judaism, the rabbi said. He uses it both at Beth Tzedec and at his Beth Emeth Minchah shiur to "try to distil Judaism and make it extremely relevant to our hearts... We're so mind-centred that we forget about the heart."

Other innovations of his – or in many cases, reintroductions of old traditions – include meditating before beginning to pray, an exercise Rabbi Glazer conducted at the student retreat.

His efforts reflect a recent trend in synagogue transformation – particularly in the United States – to find new ways to infuse spirituality into services.

While Toronto has "a very different culture," Rabbi Glazer said, "if you cultivate spiritual direction within enough people... it won't be uncommon to find people in shul taking time before services begin, to settle the mind. That is what our sages taught. We have all these traditions that are very much a part of the Jewish way."

With an arts background that includes a career as a student filmmaker, the rabbi believes Judaism needs to become "much more interdisciplinary" to meet the needs of contemporary Jews who are looking for meaning. . . .

Birthright participants not deterred by violence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite an upsurge in violence in Israel, as of last week only one of the 105 participants scheduled to leave on a Birthright Israel trip this week had cancelled because of safety concerns, organizers said.

At a social gathering last week for the participants – most of whom are York University students – the two dozen or so young adults seemed to talk more about what to pack and who would room together than about security for the trip.

"I thought there would be a lot more people hesitant about going," said Shayna Allen, director of the JSF: The Centre for Jewish Campus Life at York University and a Birthright madrichah. She had fielded only a handful of phone calls regarding security concerns, but anticipated more as this week's departure date approached.

At the Canada-Israel Experience Centre, the trip's provider, only one call regarding security had been received as of last Thursday, The CJN was told.

(Trip organizers said one Birthright participant also cancelled after being unable to reschedule an exam.)

Jeff Miller, a 21-year-old York student, figures the media reports he hears are "normal for Israel." When non-Jewish friends tell him not to go, "I say I'm going. That's it."

"I'm nervous because of the situation, but I'm also excited," Stephanie Shernofsky, a case manager for an insurance company, told The CJN.

At 26, Shernofsky is at the upper age limit that qualifies her for the free trip. "It's now or never," she said, "and I want to be part of it."

She has applied for previous Birthright trips, but was not accepted because there were more applicants than spots.

Morgan Rosenberg, a day-school graduate who became eligible for the trip when she turned 18 last year, sees Birthright as a "natural progression" for her.

Of 105 participants, only one cancellation

Adine Taveroff, 21 – who was accepted for the trip with friends and fellow York students Bonnie Shay and Ellie Satz – said she is nervous but also "very excited and looking forward to it." Having visited Israel at age 13, she feels she didn't really appreciate it the first time.

Taveroff's mother, Patti, said she has "a lot of very mixed feelings. I can't tell you with certainty that she'll be going next week. We're going to be watching the news and listening to the reports coming out of Israel very closely."

Shay, who was last in Israel 1½ years ago, said this is the first time she's had second thoughts, but that she knew if she didn't go, she would regret it.

The three friends are quite content with the restrictions imposed for security reasons. "There's no free time, and we're happy about that," said Taveroff.

"It's not an issue at all," added Satz.

Rob Berger, 25, was a Birthright participant last summer, became involved in the Birthright alumni committee and is returning to Israel as a madrich. He never considered cancelling, he said, even after the suicide bombing at Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium discotheque only days before his group left Toronto.

Birthright's security is "top-notch," said Berger, who works at a marketing research firm where non-Jewish colleagues, in particular, have expressed concern or questioned him about his decision to be part of Birthright. His parents are also worried, he said, but they have been supportive, as have his friends.

Daniel Wiser, a 22-year-old York student, said his mother asked him questions that implied she didn't want him to go. "The risks, especially now, are kind of concerning. Nevertheless, it's a good opportunity," he said.

His fellow student Pam Heifetz, 20, whose older sister had a positive experience on a Birthright trip last summer, said some of her friends told her she was "a bit crazy" to go.

Although she said the news "shapes your thoughts" to a certain extent, she was becoming excited as the departure date approached.

"You can't let terrorists scare you off," said her father Jim.

York student Mark Weisz, 21, also admitted to being nervous, but said determinedly that he would be in Israel "to have a good time, not to worry about the situation."

The program, which relies on daily security updates, is "as secure as humanly possible," said Berger.

Security precautions that restrict students from spending free time on their own "kind of put you in a bubble," said Berger, adding that Birthright is an "amazing" program.

York University student David Zameret, 19, is partly motivated to go to Israel because so many other people are staying away. "As a Jew and a supporter of Israel, I know how much they need tourism. Even though I'm not paying for it, someone else is."

New JPL director aims to boost awareness of the library

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There's a new, but familiar, face at the Jewish Public Library.

As director of the Albert and Temmy Latner JPL, Rabbi Irwin Witty is planning to turn the library into an active member of the community.

"Until now, the library has not received the attention it deserves as a repository of the cultural, historical and literary treasures of the Jewish people," Rabbi Witty said in an interview.

Rabbi Irwin Witty

Rabbi Witty was the director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education for 28 years. He then worked at the Milwaukee Jewish Federation for two years assisting in the coalition for Jewish learning before returning to Toronto. He started at the library last May.

Sitting in the basement stacks with a 1601 copy of the Olat Tamid, published in Venice, Italy, behind him, Rabbi Witty spoke of the library's ability to meet the needs of a wide audience.

High school students come to do research and immigrants come to find books in a familiar language, whether it is English, Russian, Hebrew or Yiddish, Rabbi Witty said.

"There are regular users here who come to do research and there are those who come occasionally to simply immerse themselves in a Jewish book."

The collection's catalogue and borrowing system is in the midst of being computerized so that it will be more accessible, Rabbi Witty said.

The library currently houses 57,000 volumes, as well as a clipping service that has religious and historical topics of interest spanning the past 20 years. After recently merging with the Holocaust Memorial Centre, the JPL also contains one of the largest collections of Holocaust materials in the city.

The library originally opened up on Spadina Avenue in 1942. It later moved to Markham Street and then to Glen Park Avenue before settling at its current address at the Lipa Green building at 4600 Bathurst St.

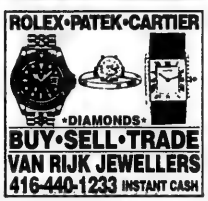
As the library grows, the limited space may force a move into another facility further north, Rabbi Witty said. However, the current goal is to clear as much space as possible in its current location so that many of the books can be taken out of storage and made available to the public.

He said the work of the library's chair, Jerry Klasner, and the support of Albert Latner and many other donors has enabled it to expand and buy books from Israel and the United States.

It's also important for the library to move into different programs in the community, the rabbi said. An evening in memory of Mordecai Richler was sponsored by the JPL during the Jewish Book Fair and several additional lectures are set for this month.

Barbara Kessel will speak on Suddenly Jewish: Jews Raised as Gentiles Discover Their Jewish Roots on Feb. 12 at 8 p.m., and Dr. Ted Cohen will speak on Aspects of Jewish Humour: Good, Bad, Difficult and Dangerous on February 27 at 8 p.m.

The lectures will take place at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Admission for both is free. For details, call 416-635-2996.



CJC to get on-air apology

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress will receive an on-air apology and air time to respond to recent controversial statements made by a guest on local radio station AM 640.

CJC Ontario region executive director Bernie Farber and community relations director Len Rudner will be on the air the afternoon of Feb. 17 to respond to remarks made last month by Norman Finkelstein, an American Jewish professor who is known for his argument that Jews exploit the Holocaust for financial gain and to justify Israel's treatment of Palestinians [CJN, Jan. 31].

CJC will also be able to respond to Finkelstein's contentious statements about the Holocaust and reparations to survivors.

Young adults meet to support Israel

By BRAM AARON
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — A newly formed advocacy group for young adults spent its inaugural meeting watching and analyzing Palestinian Authority television commercials that incite Arab youths to attack and murder Israelis and Jews.

Participants saw a 15-minute video that instructs youths on their religious duty to murder Israelis. Featuring soft melodies juxtaposed with images of killing and death, it promises that children killed in the "revolt" against Israel will be glorified as martyrs.

The video was presented by guest speaker Moshe Ronen, former national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, to the Israel Advocacy Group for Young Jewish Adults.

Those in attendance reacted with varying degrees of anger, sadness and disgust.

"I had heard before about the so-called Palestinian education system, but seeing this video helped me understand the type of environment in which those children grow up," said Henry Segal, 29, one of 37 participants at the Jan. 17 meeting at Toronto's Aish HaTorah Village Shul.

The new group is a partnership between Aish HaTorah and Afterword, Canada's national Jewish student newspaper.

"The purpose of the group is for young Jewish adults to show their support for Israel," said Dave Gordon, Afterword founder and publisher, who organized the group with Rabbi Dan Rand, Aish HaTorah's director of programming for young adults.

"It was not just an information session but also a tactical 'tachlis' [putting words into action]," Gordon said.

The group was created because Afterword and Aish HaTorah decided that, after 17 months of the current crisis in Israel, there was little being done to inform young Jewish adults who have little knowledge about the situation in Israel and aren't getting accurate information elsewhere.

"There is such a vacuum of information-al presence and activity," Gordon said. "We felt it was our duty to fill in that vacuum and be that voice."

Gordon got the idea for the group after giving a workshop on Israel and the media at an Israel advocacy conference run last February by Montreal's Hillel.

"I noticed that Montreal has really been on top with Israel advocacy, really mobilizing the students."

Gordon's aim is for the group to organize letter-writing campaigns, petitions, demonstrations and regular informational sessions. His slogan for the group is: "Anticipate, participate, don't hibernate!"

After showing the video, Ronen led a critical discussion on Israel's portrayal in the international media.

He said much of the reporting treats suicide bombers and the IDF as moral equivalents, and that Arab regimes are not scrutinized the way Israel is.

"Israel is a democracy, yet no one in the media looks at the Palestinian Authority (PA) and other Arab countries with regard to being free," said Ronen, who pointed to the high amount of alleged corruption in PA leadership, and the subjugation of its own citizenry.

"No one reports that Jews living in Arab lands have no rights or freedoms, while Arabs living in Israel have all their rights as Israeli citizens."

Ronen distributed information sheets and stressed the importance of knowing the facts about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

He also examined other PA-sponsored hatred and incitement toward Jews, saying the video is far from the only example.

"It's in their textbooks, on state TV, and it's all officially sanctioned," he said.

Les Boven, 34, also attended the event. "These reporting examples show not only that there heavy bias in reporting on Israel, there are outright lies," he said, adding the lies must be combatted with education and activism.

To get involved with the new advocacy group, call Dave Gordon at 416-631-8053, or e-mail afterwordmag@hotmail.com.

Concordia cuts ties with 'illegitimate' student leaders

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University is refusing to transfer any more student dues to the interim executive of the Concordia Student Union (CSU) and has supsended all discussion with it because it considers the recently appointed body "illegitimate."

Concordia rector Frederick Lowy said the CSU council of representatives is committing "an abuse of power" in "imposing" an interim executive of unelected students after the CSU's recent annulment of a November byelection for a new CSU executive.

The failure to recognize the victory of the Representative Union (RU), which took 45.5 per cent of the votes in a field of three slates, is "totally unacceptable and undemocratic, and the administration of Concordia University has a moral responsibility to act in the best interests of the institution," Lowy said in a press release.

The administration will continue to collect the dues on behalf of the CSU and hold them in trust until there is a "duly elected" CSU executive, he said.

"This latest election debacle... only add[s] to the frustration of students who find themselves misrepresented and disenfranchised. In the interests of the students and the institution, the university will not accept this situation."

Despite having taken this position, Concordia acknowledges that the CSU, which represents Concordia's approximately 23,000 undergraduates, is an independent and autonomous corporation and that the university has no authority over its activities.

The 2001-2002 CSU executive, elected last spring, was dominated by a far-left group with close ties to the militant Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights.

'Abuse of power'

It gained notoriety for two incidents last year. In one, two CSU officials were expelled after an altercation with Concordia security stemming from an incident in August in which anti-Israel graffiti was spray-painted on university property. In another controversy, the CSU published a student handbook in September that appeared to encourage violent rebellion and contained anti-Semitic innuendoes.

The November byelection was precipitated by the resignation of CSU president Sabrina Stea two days before the submission of a 3,200-signature student petition expressing a lack of confidence in the CSU.

After Stea's resignation, the CSU appointed an interim government, with Patrice Blais, who was on the former executive, as acting president. Blais promised at that time that he and his executive would leave Jan. 23.

Blais has refused to give up the presidency and has said the CSU will be seeking a court order to force Concordia to hand over funds to the CSU.

The petition denouncing the CSU leadership was initiated by Chris Schulz, who later became head of the RU, which promised a more moderate, less politicized CSU.

The RU, which was supported by the Hillel Jewish student association, never took office. Following contestations of the elections, whose source was never disclosed, the CSU judicial board ruled last month that the election was invalid because of irregularities.

The most glaring problem cited was the RU's disqualification by chief electoral officer Jessica Lajambe, just hours before polls opened, on charges of attempting to bribe an opposition candidate to pull out. The RU was reinstated later the same day.

The election was extended by three days to give students who had voted while the RU was off the ballot a chance to vote again.

In its ruling, the judicial board noted that only 226 of the 556 students who voted while the RU was out of the race returned to vote, and therefore, 300 had their votes annulled.

Lowy doesn't dispute that the election was biased against the RU, but he noted the slate "nevertheless, obtained the majority of the votes."

The matter was then handed over to the CSU council of representatives which voted 14-6 on Jan. 23 not to appoint the RU slate as the interim executive until general CSU elections in March. Blais informed the council that night, minutes before his term expired, that he would not step down as president, although the rest of the executive did so.

On Jan. 25, Blais appointed five RU candidates to a new interim executive, including Schulz, by "presidential decree" after deciding the RU had the most legitimate claim to be on the executive. (He did not agree, however, to give up the presidency.)

These appointments were rescinded hours later, after the university administration announced it was refusing to recognize the interim executive.

At The CJN's deadline, Blais was the only member of the executive, an RU spokesperson said.

Blais sees the university's latest action as an attack on the CSU's independence, he told The Link, a Concordia student newspaper.

Schulz could not be reached by The CJN for further comment.

Research director gives students 'tools' to fight Arab propaganda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Itamar Marcus

TORONTO — Itamar Marcus has been a keen observer of the Palestinian media for years, so he was not particularly surprised when in early January, during a lull in the intifadah, he noticed a reduction, though not the elimination, of the "steady stream of violence" in Palestinian TV's daily programming.

Instead of the constant barrage of video clips urging children to fight Israel and seek martyrdom, that same message was reserved primarily as filler between regularly scheduled programs.

It wasn't that Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority (PA) had gone soft and given up the terror option, but rather, it marked a tactical maneuver to ease the pressure the PA had been experiencing from U.S. and Israeli leaders, who had demanded an end to incitement, he said.

Marcus, founder and director of Palestinian Media Watch (PMW)(www.pmw.org.il), believes Arafat has been playing a double game for a long time, appearing conciliatory in English language statements, while in Arabic urging Palestinians to ratchet up the level of violence.

Even while detaining members of Hamas to please the United States and Israel, he has offered apologies for the arrests in the PA's official newspaper, al-Hayat al-Jadida, saying he was under pressure to do so.

And while Arafat routinely condemns Hamas terror attacks, only three weeks ago he dispatched his cabinet secretary, Ahmad Abdel-Rahman to participate in Hamas' anniversary celebrations, Marcus said.

Marcus, a native new Yorker who immigrated to Israel 25 years ago, says his research into cultural trends in Palestinian society indicate there is no desire to reconcile with Israel. Instead, in statements intended for Arab audiences, Palestinian leaders have openly admitted the Oslo peace process was nothing more than a tactical means to continue towards their goal of eliminating Israel.

A little over a year ago, Abu Ali Shaheen, the PA's minister of supply, stated as much, saying in al-Hayat al-Jadida that Oslo was useful "to get a foothold, not to gain a permanent settlement, because war and conflict are easier on the land than from a distant land," Marcus quoted him saying.

Marcus believes many Canadian and American Jewish students are ill equipped to respond to Palestinian propaganda, which invariably paints Palestinians as innocent victims and Israel as "conceived in original sin."

He was recently in Canada to meet with students at Toronto's York University, and the University of Toronto as well as at Montreal's Concordia University. He also addressed community meetings.

"Jewish students are bombarded [by Palestinian propaganda] and they don't have the information so they don't have answers," he said.

Prior to departing for Canada, Marcus prepared a Powerpoint presentation that is comprised mainly of excerpts from the Palestinian media.

"There's nothing more powerful as confronting the Palestinians with their own words," he said.

Repeated newspaper and television images showed how Palestinian children as young as eight and nine being urged to attack Israelis and seek "martyrdom." The images show how the Palestinian media "promotes and glorifies child violence" and even how parents celebrate their youngsters' deaths, distributing candy and sweets as if at a party.

"You don't get articles that say, 'children, stay home, it's dangerous out there.' Just the opposite," Marcus said.

The imagery of violence and martyrdom is a constant in Palestinian society, employed by Arafat to "brainwash kids almost every single day" to create a generation willing to fight Israel while giving Arafat some deniability, saying the violence was spontaneous, he added.

Overall, he's not optimistic that the situation will calm down anytime soon. "Until there is a total change in the PA leadership and re-education, the peace process has not really begun," he said. "Until that happens, Israelis can't delude ourselves and ignore what [the Palestinians] are saying to each other."

CORRECTION

The article on jewishhamilton.org, the new Web site of Hamilton's UJA Federation (CJN, Jan. 31) incorrectly stated that the site does not have a local Jewish yellow pages option. It does have such an option, but it is called Community Resources. The CJN regrets the error.

CLARIFICATION

In an article (CJN, Jan 24) about HIPPY, Home Instruction for Parents of Preschool Youngsters, we did not indicate that National Council of Jewish Women of Canada has been a partner in the program since its inception. The CJN regrets the oversight.

Media portrayals of Arafat

According to Reports

This week, Washington is hosting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer. In the days preceding this visit, the Canadian media has tried to assess the gap between the Bush administration's unusually blunt but realistic criticism of Palestinan Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, and the European Union's desperate efforts to salvage something in his defence.

Thomas Friedman, the New York Times' leading foreign affairs columnist, summed up the U.S. mood in his column "Dead Man Walking" (Jan. 30): "Few American, Israeli or Arab leaders, not to mention Palestinians, really believe anymore that [Arafat] will ever lead his people into a peace deal with Israel. The only thing keeping Mr. Arafat afloat today is that no one wants to own his demise…"

U.S. President George W. Bush is incensed, not just because he believes Arafat lied about his involvement in the Karine-A affair, but because it is part of a pattern of deception. Two earlier ships carrying arms from Iran, the Santorini and the Calypso, were also seized last year. All three captures occurred while the United States was pursuing peace and cease-fire agreements.

In two op-eds in the Globe and Mail last month, Gerald Steinberg, professor at Bar-Ilan University, discussed the danger of illegal weapons buildup in the Middle East. On Jan. 4, just prior to the revelation of the Karine-A shipment, Steinberg wrote about Arafat's avid pursuit of illegal weaponry. (On Jan. 30, he described the dangerous buildup of long-range missiles and non-conventional weapons by Libya's Muammar Qaddafi – a worrisome development rarely addressed by the media.)

On Jan. 27, U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney denounced Arafat for collusion with "a terrorist organization, Hezbollah, and a state [Iran] that supports and promotes terrorism." The next day, he told NBC News, "My own personal view is that [the Karine-A arms-smuggling plot with Iran] would not have happened without [Arafat's] knowledge."

Bush called Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on Jan. 28, saying that Arafat misled him: "I was led to believe [Arafat] was willing to join us in the fight on terror. I took him at his word."

The Winnipeg Free Press editorial, "After Arafat" (Jan. 23) drew the appropriate conclusion: "[Arafat's] authority among Palestinians is doubtful, his credibility internationally is shattered. Israel will not deal with him. Neither should Canada or other western nations. His martyrdom would mean nothing. His resignation, however, although it would create uncertainty and danger, would at least open new opportunities for his people. That is the sacrifice Mr. Arafat should make."

With the evidence overwhelmingly indicating that Arafat is completely untrustworthy, why do some journalists – including various editorialists who acknowledge Arafat's penchant for lying – still shift the burden of responsibility for the dangerous state of Israeli-Palestinian relations to Sharon?

Levine becomes first Jewish PQ cabinet minister

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Reaction in the Jewish community to the appointment of David Levine, the first Jewish cabinet minister in a Parti Québécois (PQ) government, was low-key.

Levine, 53, was named junior health minister, a new position in Premier Bernard Landry's cabinet, in last week's shuffle. He is the third Jewish cabinet minister in Quebec history, following Liberals Victor Goldbloom, who served in the 1970s, and Herbert Marx, who served in the '80s.

Levine, however, is not an elected member of the National Assembly.

"I don't think Mr. Landry's intention was to send a message to the Jewish or anglophone community," said Joseph Gabay, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region. "Levine was chosen for his qualifications. Landry was looking for the right guy at the right moment. This is more a pragmatic choice than a political one."

Levine, who was the executive-director of Ottawa Hospital until last fall, has spent most of his career in health-care administration. As junior health minister, he will assist new Health Minister François Legault.

Gabay said Levine's experience in health-care management means he understands the challenges faced by these institutions.

"But because he is Jewish, we should not assume he will give some benefit to the Jews," Gabay said. "It's a general rule that when a Jew is in a key position, he is careful not to give preferential treatment to the community, because he knows he is being watched."

Levine is one of the few anglophones who embraced sovereignty in its early years. Attracted to its social democratic politics, he has since worked almost entirely in the francophone milieu.

Thomas Hecht, Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) Quebec chair and longtime advocate of rapprochement with Quebec nationalists, said he doubts Landry intended to gain anything from the community with this appointment.

"Levine is just so non-representative of the Jewish community," Hecht said. "Other than growing up Jewish, he has had little to do with the community. He is totally integrated in the Quebec functionary system."

Hecht does not think Levine's appointment guarantees more understanding from the government. "We have sympathetic ears in the cabinet right now. I don't think it will make much difference."

The health portfolio is crucial to the Jewish community, whose public health-care institutions receive tens of millions of dollars of government funding annually.

"We are grateful to see a man of such experience appointed to this important ministry," FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings said.

One of the community's outstanding health concerns regards last year's Bill 28, which reorganized the boards of health institutions, leaving what was felt to be too little representation for its volunteers and benefactors.

Levine's association with Landry goes back 25 years. From 1977-80, Levine was a senior adviser to Landry, who was then minister of state for economic development.

Levine spent much of his time talking to anglophone, often Jewish, audiences, trying to calm what he felt was unwarranted panic over the PQ, then in its first-ever mandate.

In 1979, he ran for the PQ in a byelection in the heavily Jewish riding of D'Arcy McGee, and was trounced by Marx. Premier René Lévesque had hoped Levine could quell fears among Jews about the coming sovereignty referendum.

Levine was appointed as Quebec's delegate-general in New York City in 1997 and served for a year before he cut short his term to take the Ottawa position. He lost that job after three years when the Ontario government placed the hospital under trusteeship after it incurred a $100-million deficit.

In 1992, Levine became the first non-French-Canadian director-general of the 118-year-old Notre Dame Hospital, Quebec's largest. He was selected from over 90 candidates, having at 43 already earned a reputation in the province as an innovative and skilled health-care administrator.

An enriching camp experience

Camp Katonim is a fabulous summer day camp located on majestic Lake Simcoe near Keswick. In a beautiful country setting, less than 40 minutes away from Thornhill, children enjoy an enriching camp experience with full waterfront facilities. Busing is arranged for Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Aurora and Newmarket residents.

The camp, which has about 120 campers, offers a well balanced program with instruction in all waterfront activities, including Red Cross and recreational swim, canoeing, sailing, and waterskiing.

As well, land sports, drama productions, theme days, arts & crafts and Friday evening Oneg Shabbat, are an integral part of the Katonim experience. Campers also enjoy canoe trips and overnights in nearby provincial parks. Camp Katonim offers an overnight camp experience in a day camp setting.

Camp Katonim has 1-8 wk. sessions for children 3-14 years old. There is also a CIT program for 15 & 16 yr. olds. The staff is mature, experienced and energetic, dedicating themselves to ensure that your children have the best camping experience possible. For over 55 years, Camp Katonim has continued to provide the highest quality camping adventures and many wonderful lasting memories.

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 23 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its 10th fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, there is no busing throughout the day as all activities are held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two week session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

NEW FOR 2002: Par Golf is now offering weekend junior programs beginning in May. Call us for more information.

For more information on any of our programs, please visit our website at www.learngolf.com or call us at telephone (416) 960-GOLF (4653).

Hashomer Hatzair / Camp Shomria

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer camp experience for youths 7-16 from Canada, the U.S., and around the world. A variety of challenging sports, theme days, educational and cultural activities create an atmosphere designed to build life-long friendships. It's located on Otty Lake, a beautiful waterfront, ideal for a wide selection of fun-filled water activities.

Camp Shomria promotes deep love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It's run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, established over 80 yrs. ago, and is active within the Jewish community. There are weekly activities available throughout the school year in Toronto and a 6-day residential winter camp during December. A special one-week introductory camping experience is offered to campers in grades 2 and 3. Activities include dance, arts & crafts, a dynamic drama program, hikes, trips and a rope course (see directory). Grade 10 graduates participate in a leadership training program, "Yedid Plus", which includes an intensive 5 wk. itinerary in Israel.

Staff are dedicated and committed. Most were Shomria campers. Camp Shomria has a full-time registered nurse on site. Health and safety is our top priority. OCA standards of excellence are met and often exceeded. To learn more about Camp Shomria, please call Simon, Camp Director, Ora or Miriam at 416-736-1339.

Camp Shalom - 54 and going strong

Camp Shalom is getting ready to celebrate its 54th year in the upcoming 2002 camping season. Located on beautiful Lake Muskoka, the camp has established itself as an exceptional Zionist Jewish camp for boys and girls aged 8-13 in the Gravenhurst area of Ontario.

Shalom campers experience the joys of a terrific summer vacation, under the care of a well-trained staff, with a better-than-3:1 camper-to-staff ratio. As a not-for profit camp affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea and accredited by the OCA, Camp Shalom imbues its campers with a sense of Jewish history, cultural values and the centrality of Israel in Jewish life. The Camp Shalom ethic promotes the ideals of mutual respect, sharing and fair play in interpersonal relationships.

Camp Shalom features an individualized program wherein each child is free to choose from over 25 daily activities including canoe, sailing, ropes, baseball, basketball, tennis, inter-camp sports, archery, self-defense, gymnastics, dance, fitness, beach volleyball, mini-golf, daily instructional swim, waterskiing, kayaking, drama, arts & crafts, photography, expanded tripping program, nature, scouting, music, camp newspaper, sports house leagues, rock climbing, media program, golf activities and more. The media group updates the Camp Shalom website daily.

The Camp Shalom staff is looking forward to the upcoming summer and the privilege of sharing another wonderful season with so many fortunate campers. Come join our family!

Camp Moshava Canada – Camping above all the rest!

Camp Moshava Canada, the only Orthodox, Zionist, B'nei Akiva camp in Canada, is situated on 250 acres of beachfront property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

This year we are forging ahead with major renovations to several buildings in the camp and expect to begin building our new infirmary as well. Look for major upgrades to the serving areas in our expanded kitchen/dining hall facility, as well as notable improvements to several areas of the grounds.

In recent years, Camp Moshava Canada has established a reputation for serving fine food. Our 2nd service salad bar is extremely popular with the campers. No matter one's requirements, all campers' dietary needs are met.

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and an outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre featuring regulation size basketball, volleyball and floor hockey courts as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, biking, and a ball hockey rink.

Moshava has a 2-week "splash of camp" program designed for grade 2 graduates. The camp's regularly scheduled days include instructional swimming in an outdoor heated pool, canoeing, water-skiing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips and fishing.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere that exists amongst staff and campers is truly a special one. Only those who have actually encountered a Shabbat at Camp Moshava Canada can truly appreciate what the experience is like! Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience, it's an experience of a lifetime!

Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, knee-boarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size pool allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a fully qualified medical staff.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted 2 very successful programs. Firstly, we offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-10. The other is our Big Brother/Big Sister program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp to help campers feel more at ease.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience, then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Morley Mason at (613) 228-8495.

Lynrich Arts - Fine Art Studio Camp

Camp Lynrich has been a Toronto area art supplier and educator for 24 years. For ten years, they've been running their popular Fine Arts Studio Camp for children aged seven to 16.

If your kids show artistic talent, send them to Camp Lynrich. They'll learn techniques, enhance their self- esteem, and push their creative abilities to the max. They can create a portfolio, wonderful gifts, or pieces for friends and family to enjoy.

Lynrich campers learn to sketch and draw, including cartooning, pastel, charcoal work and may also do some claymation.

Camp Lynrich teaches landscape painting (including fun tricks for making clouds and trees), and how to draw the human figure. Watercolour techniques include wet on wet, washes and dry brush. Colour mixing is taught too, as are oils and acrylics.

Campers learn to carve, create clay figures and animal sculptures, make vases, pinch pots and busts. Other crafts include paper making, papier mache, stained glass, bisque and boondoggle.

Camp Lynrich provides the best materials. The talented, experienced teachers are strong both in the arts and sociology and psychology, and enjoy working with kids.

You can choose from weekly, bi- weekly, monthly or all- summer sessions, and the new week- long cottager special. Hours are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Pizza lunch is supplied Thursdays; kids bring their own other days.

For busy parents who need to drop their kids off before work and pick them up after, there's a Breakfast Club from 8 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. An additional weekly fee applies.

You can write Lynrich Arts: 73 Doncaster Ave., Thornhill ON L3T 1L6. Register before March 1st and get 10% off with this ad.

Camp George a Success Phenomenon —and Growing!

You're in good company if you plan to send your child this summer to Camp George — Reform Judaism's first Canadian camp.

From the time it opened in '99, Camp George has been an instant success, offering many children their first chance to develop a day-by-day awareness of Judaism they may have previously experienced only at home or synagogue. The camp, in fact, is almost fully booked already for the coming summer, with waiting lists for some age groups in some sessions.

Situated on a magnificently wooded lakefront setting 2-1/2 hours from Toronto, the camp is designed to help youngsters 8 to 16 years old develop their physical, social and personal skills —all in a supportive, non-competitive and fun environment. Every child's self-image and Jewish identity is also enhanced by being part of a community that includes Rabbis, Rabbinic students, educators and mature youngsters who have chosen to spend their summer working at Camp George.

Every parent can appreciate how important it is to choose the right summer camp for their child. So although Camp George already offers youngsters tennis, volleyball, basketball and multi-purpose courts plus all the boating, water skiing, arts and crafts, camp-outs and indoor/outdoor games children have come to expect from a summer camp, emphasis during the winter has been placed on expansion, adding new cabins and resources to accommodate mushrooming camp enrollment and off-season bookings.

Camp Director Jack Feldman who, besides a Master's Degree in social work, brings to Camp George a wealth of experience drawn from camps in the U.S. and Canada, is urging families to avoid disappointment and get their enrollment applications in as soon as possible for the remaining vacancies.

Families who want additional information or registration forms can contact Camp George at 905-762-1581.

More information and literature is also available from the Rabbi, Educator or President of any Reform synagogue in Canada.

Our camp's reputation is growing!
But space is shrinking – so enroll your child now!
There's already a waiting list for some age groups!
Word's getting around about this world class lakefront camp with programs to build young Jewish values. And this summer will be even better, with more cabins, more activities, more Judaic crafts. But you should call now! Some age groups in some sessions are already sold out!

Lubavitch Day Camp

It is our belief that a camp should do a lot more than just provide fun and games. A Jewish camp should be a place where children can also experience the richness, excitement and warmth of Judaism in a truly enjoyable and unforgettable atmosphere!

We provide hot lunches, door to door transportation, instructional and recreational swimming, a warm Jewish atmosphere, creative playground, arts & crafts, dance, martial arts, sports and much more, for children 2 1/2—12.

The daily schedule runs from 9 a.m.—4 p.m. Monday—Friday, for children ages 5 1/2—12, for 3—5 1/2 year olds the camp day is from 10 a.m.—3 p.m. and our morning program for 2 1/2—3 1/2 year olds runs from 10 a.m.—1 p.m.

We offer large discounts for registration before March 15th and a discount for each additional child.

To receive more information or to register please contact our camp director Rabbi Mendel Bernstein at 905-731-7000 or 770 Chabad Gate, Thornhill, Ont. L4J 3V9.

Camp Eden, for art and sport

Would you like to give your child a chance to develop the ability to draw, paint or sculpt -- and spend more time outdoors in the good weather, away from computers and TV? If so, get in touch with Lior Gluzberg of Camp Eden.

Camp Eden is an art-based camp. It grew out of the Klim School of Art, which has taught art to children in Thornhill for eight years.

Your kids can register in the art or sport section. The art section does include sports, and lots of time outside enjoying nature. Aspects of art such as drawing from nature get the kids outdoors, too.

Camp Eden has the best quality of experienced staff. Along with physical wellbeing, enjoyment of nature, and arts learning, social skills are emphasized. Games, for example, emphasize co-operation and teamwork.

To be closer to campers' homes, Camp Eden has moved from the Credit River area to a new site near Bathurst and Highway 7. This location has 30 acres' expanse of green, well-treed land, as well as excellent indoor facilities.

Registration is now underway; call Lior Gluzberg at 905-882-1679. Busing service is available.

EXCITING SUMMER ACTIVITIES AT REENA

Cottage Reena 2002

Reena is once again sponsoring a Summer Cottage program during the months of July and August, for teens (over 16) and adults with a developmental disability.

This integrated two-week vacation package incorporates life skills and social skills-training into exciting and varied leisure/recreational activities.

The cottages are located in the beautiful and rustic Georgian Bay tourist district.

A full and exciting program is being planned.

Summer Recreation Program

NOT JUST A DAY CAMP –

Reena offers an exciting adventure for teens and young adults (from 13-21 years of ages) with a developmental disability.

Indoor sports, music, computer fun and arts/crafts are offered weekly at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre (Clark/Bathurst Street) along with community outings and swimming.

You can register for a day - a week - or the full program which runs for eight weeks throughout the summer.

ONLY 40 SPOTS LEFT!

Over 45,000 Canadians die each year from smoking.

That's more than 45,000 reasons to get tough on tobacco.

45,000 Canadians. That's five times the number of people who die from car accidents, murder, suicides and alcohol abuse combined.

What's even more tragic is every tobacco-related sickness and death could have been prevented. Smoking is Canada's #1 preventable health problem.

Over 45,000 deaths a year is unacceptable. It has to stop.

The Government of Canada is taking strong action to address Canada's #1 preventable public health problem. Over the next five years, we will invest $530 million to reduce smoking in Canada.

Health Canada has a simple, three-part plan:

- Keep young Canadians from starting
- Help more smokers quit
- Raise awareness of the dangers of second-hand smoke

Our plan goes beyond just providing information. It offers real solutions. For real results. And whether you smoke or not, you can be part of the solution.

Tory leadership vote set for Shabbat

He said he won't be voting on March 23, "and that puts a bitter taste in my mouth."

In an interview, party president Devlin defended the way the voting is being handled as "the most open process of any party."

While there will be no advance voting, "we have a proxy vote," he said, adding that Jews could conceivably cast ballots after the Sabbath ends March 23 at 7:15 p.m. "If it's seven o'clock and it looks as though there's going to be one more ballot, we'll do it," said Devlin, who is Jewish.

Devlin sidestepped a question on how the party's executive voted on allowing advance polls, saying only that "we had lots of discussion."

But Gilboord said he has it on good authority that the executive voted 12-9 not to allow advance voting. The executive, he said, "blew it."

He said he addressed the party's rules committee about this in December, and that the party was aware of a problem long before that. "No one can say they missed this."

Jules Kronis, a longtime Tory insider who is Jewish, criticized his party's rules as "flawed" – especially since the proxy vote is not preferential. That means a party member cannot cast ballots for more than one contender, rendering their choice meaningless should that candidate lose on the first ballot. "They've got to change the [party's] constitution," he said. Kronis said he won't be voting either.

Georgeanne Burke, a founder of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools and a member of the Thornhill PC riding executive, said she's "quite unhappy" with the situation.

"On the one hand, the party does want to open up, but it's difficult for them to pull it off on this occasion. I'm upset they couldn't find a way to do this."

Burke said her displeasure was fired up even more when she discovered that one of the four days on which a voter must apply for a proxy is a Saturday.

Party insiders say the candidate with most to lose without the Jewish vote is Jim Flaherty, who, of the five hopefuls, has most fulsomely praised the education tax credit.

Flaherty has said he supports the credit with no strings attached. Last month, he was quoted as saying his party has not made the necessary provisions for those who observe Saturday as their day of religious observance.

Asked whether the party executive's decision not to hold advance polls was a political one designed to hurt Flaherty, Gilboord said, "it was 100 per cent politics. It was not bureaucratic stumbling. It was politics, pure and simple.

"Either they're stacked against Flaherty, or they're heartless, or incompetent, or they made a mistake and won't admit it."

Israel's president to visit Canada for CIC dinner

Relations between two countries still considered strong, says ambassador

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Relations between Canada and Israel are still considered to be very strong, despite occasional disagreements, says Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

"We look at Canada as one of our closest friends. We have an ongoing, intensive and intimate dialogue with the government of Canada on various issues," he said in a recent interview.

Divon spoke of the plans under way for Israeli President Moshe Katsav's three-day state visit to Canada in early March as the guest of Governor General Adrienne Clarkson. Katsav will meet with parliamentarians and the media, and is scheduled to be the guest of honour at the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) parliamentary dinner on March 6.

"We are looking forward to having him here," Divon said. "The program being prepared by the government of Canada is a very good one. This visit will be another unique milestone and a good opportunity to review Canada-Israel relations and to speak about the peace process."

The two countries have "excellent collaboration in many fields, from jurisprudence to cultural and academic relations," Divon said. "Canada was very instrumental in the efforts vis-à-vis the Iranian Jews who were detained. Even on the multilateral front, which is of great concern to many members of the Jewish community, Canada is second to the United States in terms of being on our side in international forums.

Ambassador Divon

"It doesn't mean that there are not disappointments, but there are some issues on which everyone disappoints us, including the U.S."

Examples he cited as areas of co-operation included the annual visits of Canadian parliamentarians to Israel sponsored by the CIC; the free trade agreement signed in 1997, which has resulted in the volume of trade being doubled; and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), founded in 1993, which reflects the increasing role played by scientific research in both countries.

A number of joint projects are being explored and implemented, with CIIRDF being extremely active on this front, Divon said, and the two countries are continuing to develop new projects involving exchanges of scholars, students and musicians.

"The nature of the relations between the two countries indicates that we have reached new heights. This doesn't mean that everything is perfect, or that there are no other issues, but we have to continue to educate the Canadian public about issues pertaining to the Arab-Israeli conflict in general and this intifadah in particular."

The failure of the Oslo peace process and the subsequent increase in terrorist attacks in Israel is extremely frustrating and distressing to all Israelis, Divon said. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's continued practice of saying one thing and doing another is now being recognized by Israel's allies as his unwillingness to find a peaceful solution to the conflict.

"We are at a tragic impasse," Divon said. "The international community, including Canada, has recognized Israel's right to self-defence. If we have the right, we have no other choice but to exercise the right; it is a question of action and reaction... We count on our friends – Canada, the U.S. and others – to make it very clear to Arafat that this intifadah leads him nowhere."

Divon implores the Canadian Jewish community to maintain and strengthen its loyalty and ties to Israel, to stand firm as it struggles in the quest for peace.

"Now, more than ever, we would like to see an end to the tragic events, but in order to be able to be strong during these very difficult days, in order to be able to endure, we count on our brethren – all the Jewish communities, but particularly the one in Canada which is outstanding in its commitment and support to the people of the State of Israel," Divon said.

"Knowing that we are not alone, knowing that we can count on each and every member is a source of inspiration, and in the difficult days ahead, when we will need all the energy we have in order to fight terrorism, which will enable us to hopefully rekindle the peace process, we need the Jewish community beside us."

Divon urges all Canadian Jews to visit Israel – as tourists, to attend professional conferences, to do business – in order to help the economy and boost the morale of the people.

"Without a strong economy, it will be difficult for us to stand against the political pressures which are part of this process.

"We have faced difficult periods but, as in the past, together we will overcome."

Stavros elevates bespoke tailoring to an art form

Architecturally, Stavros Sartoriale on Cumberland St. is a marriage of warmth and elegance. Lofty ceilings, expansive display windows and a floor of fine-veined cream-coloured marble create spaciousness and light. Rich rosewood shelves brim with bolts of fine fabric.

Recently remodelled, Stavros Sartoriale embodies a conscious choice to bring tried and proven craft traditions into the third millennium. Like a fine suit, this store is tailor-made.

Every Stavros suit is "bespoke": ordered by you, custom-made for you. Each takes three fittings, with every stitch sewn in-house by skilled artisans. In keeping with Stavros' high standards, each bolt of fabric he selects is manufactured expressly for him at the finest European mills.

When Stavros first opened his doors in Canada, 40 years ago, there were hundreds of bespoke tailors. Today, he's the last of his kind in Canada; but he's mentoring successors to continue the tradition.

A Stavros tuxedo will give you the look of distinction you desire at your next wedding or special event; there are many other formal occasions where it can double as a suit. Styles range from conservative to contemporary; single breasted jackets, for example, may have either peak or notch lapels.

Stavros tuxedos are crafted from the traditional mohair. It's light in weight, but firm and lustrous, and doesn't wrinkle easily; this makes for a better appearance with less ironing and cleaning, hence less strain and longer wear.

Stavros' shirts are also custom-made. Here too, styles vary, in features such as wing or laid-down collars; and there's a wide selection of fabrics and patterns. Order any shirt you want, and its exquisite quality and glove-like fit will shine through.

Stavros offers every other article of custom formal wear you'll need to complete your ensemble. A smart custom vest is often just the right piece to unify your look. Only the accessories are ready-made, but they include everything from cufflinks to cummerbunds.

Designer clothing is supposed to offer style for the masses. Stavros offers both style and quality, tailored uniquely to make you look your very best. As manager Maurizio Vial says: "We dress very few; but these few, we dress well."

See Stavros Sartoriale for yourself, at 95 Cumberland St.; or call 416-924-8144 for an appointment. It will exceed your highest expectations.

Krames marks 25 years aiding Hamilton's poor

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — For 25 years Carol Krames has managed to find a place to live, jobs, food and clothes for those in need – as well as a shoulder to cry on as director of Hamilton's Jewish Social Services.

For her dedication and commitment, her colleagues and friends recently held a dinner to honour her work in the community.

"If you had to use one way to describe Carol it would be that she's a good person," says Bea Matchen, her colleague for the past 18 years. "We have clients who are in dire circumstances, on drugs – tough life situations – and if there's anything positive, Carol will find it. She's always able to see the favourable side of people.

"And she's so resourceful. She surprises me at how quickly she gets things done. Carol's not one to think of an idea and then deliberate: if she thinks about it today, she did it yesterday. She's able to quickly reach a decision and act on it."

Together, Krames and Matchen run a wide range of programs and services that includes counseling, help for the elderly and their families, organizing volunteers, running an adult day program, adult language classes and social programs – from a monthly lunch to theatre trips.

In the maelstrom of her office, it's hard to imagine how Krames gets her work done. There is rarely a quiet moment, and any conversation is inevitably interrupted by a visitor or a phone call.

"I live by my 'to-do' list," she laughs. "Someone recently gave me a Palm Pilot because they thought it would help me, but it just wasn't fast enough! Clients would phone asking for appointments and I couldn't access the diary quickly, so it's back to a day planner for me."

Carol Krames has offered counselling help throughout her 25 years as director of Hamilton's Jewish Social Services. [Julia Kollek photo]

Or a night planner, as Krames can get crisis calls for help at odd hours.

She remembers one night there was a call from a local motel.

"It was from a man who was passing through town and had run out of food. (My husband) Lester drove me over, and as it was right before Pesach, I took him everything I had in my kitchen. He was thrilled!"

Although Hamilton is a small community of about 5,000 Jews, there are up to 60 people at any one time on Krames' caseload.

"People think Jews are immune to social problems, and they are surprised when they hear of the cases I am working with. We deal with everything," she says."As long as there are people, there are going to be problems. Life is all about overcoming problems."

Jewish Social Services (JSS) has been solving those problems since it was founded back in 1932.

"As Jews we have a long tradition of kindness. From the beginning the services were always open to everybody, Jew and non-Jew alike," said Krames. "I never stop to analyze whether someone asking for help is Jewish or not – you just act. My caseload is full of people who hear of our reputation, and who come to us from help. If someone is on the street asking for money, you don't wonder – you have to help. I'd rather get 'taken' than not help someone that needed it."

Krames began her career as a social worker in Philadelphia, where she was born and grew up. Her first job was as a public welfare worker. "It was different then. Everyone knew who you were. Now I wouldn't do it – it's got much too dangerous."

She and her husband moved to Ontario when he was offered a job in his field as professor in psychology at the University of Toronto. The couple and their four children lived in Mississauga. There was no shul in the town at the time, and after talking to others, the couple were instrumental in founding Solel, a synagogue that continues to thrive today.

Twenty-five years ago, Carol saw the ad for her current job in The CJN and with her husband's urging, came for the interview.

"When I was offered the job, a prerequisite was that I live here, and so we moved. I fell in love with this city and its community. People here are so supportive. It is a wonderful place because it helps those in need."

She points out that Hamilton is, by and large, an affluent and generous community. "The schools and synagogues are great about helping those who have fallen on hard times, but much more is needed. It can be hard for children in those families to be part of a middle-class community, specially when they compare their apartments with their friends' big houses."

The workload in Hamilton has changed since she started her job in 1976. Early on, her main concern was helping to settle newly-arrived Russian immigrants – many of whom have since gone on to find work and become active members of the community.

Now other families are coming to her for help. There are several cases where a divorce has left a partner with little financial support.

"Problems start when the breadwinner has been laid off, and it's so frustrating when they can't find work."

"The saddest cases I see are when a person has a disability or is mentally sick and is on welfare, and their quality of life is affected."

Krames admits her work can affect her own life because she sometimes feels emotionally overwhelmed.

"Some cases do get you down, but then you look at what you can do."

One achievement was setting up a community kosher food bank. Her husband helped start it 10 years ago when hungry families were coming regularly to the JSS.

"It was supposed to be a short-term project as a response to the Ontario government cuts, but now the community has come to rely on it, and people really need the food. Without this help, people would be on the street.

"A single person on welfare gets only $500 a month, barely enough to pay rent," she points out.

Krames was at first doubtful the project would work, but her husband assured her that with a little patience, it would catch on. While the food bank has become a community fixture, Krames would still like to see more donations, and when stocks are low she is amazed at how considerate the food bank users are of each other.

"If there's only one item left on the shelf, I've heard people say 'Let's save that for someone else'."

With the community's cultural diversity, Krames has started to appreciate the food preferences of different groups. "Our Russian community, for instance, goes for the rice, oil and soup mixes – they don't want peanut butter!"

Asked about her greatest wish, she replies without a moment of hesitation.

"It would be for an endowment fund for the food bank so it would always be there for whoever needed it."

In the meantime, she has no plans to retire.

"I'm having too much fun," she says. "I could have gone to work in a government job and be on a nice pension," she says, "but every day, I'm happy to get up and come to work. I feel so blessed to have a job that I love."

Sharon meets with PA before D.C. trip

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent meeting with senior Palestinian officials has left politicians and pundits alike pondering his true intentions.

Observers are questioning whether the talks Sharon held Jan. 30 in his Jerusalem home were a tactical move aimed at pleasing the Bush administration on the eve of the prime minister's trip to Washington scheduled for later in the week.

Analysis

On the other hand, they wonder, perhaps those discussions reflected a shift in Sharon's outlook and signal an openness for reviving a political dialogue with the Palestinians.

Dovish Israelis are welcoming the talks, but some hardliners are saying Sharon should not be speaking to Palestinian leaders amid the ongoing violence.

In last week's meeting, Sharon met with Palestinian parliamentary speaker Ahmed Karia, top PLO official Mahmoud Abbas and Mohammed Rashid, an economic adviser to Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The talks were the first that Sharon, who has said he will not negotiate while Palestinians continue attacking Israel, has held with top Palestinians since taking office almost a year ago.

At the weekly cabinet meeting last Sunday, Sharon stressed he had not changed his stance that there would be no talks while violence continues.

The meeting had focused on ways to end the violence, Sharon was quoted as telling the ministers. He did not rule out another meeting following his return from Washington, D.C.

Sharon also told the cabinet that he had used the meeting to set out Israeli security demands and to tell the Palestinians that he would consider their requests based on the PA's progress in cracking down on terror.

Sharon said he is ultimately interested in reaching a final settlement with the Palestinians, but without a timetable. Any accord would depend upon developments in the Israel-Palestinian relationship, he said.

Sharon also said the Palestinian delegation had demanded that Israel halt its targeted assassinations, end military incursions into areas under Palestinian-control and lift travel restrictions on Arafat, who has been confined to Ramallah by IDF troops since December.

Some Israeli commentators suggested Sharon's meeting last week was aimed at heading off diplomatic initiatives by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, and, more recently, by Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg.

Peres learned of Sharon's meeting with the Palestinian officials as he was en route to the World Economic Forum in New York, where he had his own meeting with Karia.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Sharon reportedly repeated his objections to a proposal Peres and Karia have been discussing, which includes the idea that Israel's recognition of a Palestinian state should be the starting point for renewed negotiations.

But is this Sharon's real stand? The Israeli daily Ma'ariv quoted diplomatic sources as saying Sharon and Peres are in quiet agreement over most of the elements of the proposal under discussion.

Weekend interviews Sharon gave to two Israeli newspapers added to the confusion.

In an interview with Ma'ariv, he conceded he would agree to giving up parts of the "Greater Land of Israel" under certain conditions in a final settlement.

But he also told Yediot Achronot that he would recommend while in Washington that the Bush administration refrain from all contacts with Arafat.

"I plan to tell [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush next week, 'I advise you to ignore Arafat. Boycott him. Don't have any contact with him and don't send him delegations,'" Sharon said last Friday.

Israeli troops have kept Arafat under virtual house arrest in Ramallah in an effort to force him to crack down on terror. As a result, Arafat has been kept from his globetrotting activities aimed at drumming up support for the Palestinian cause.

U.S. remains cool on Arafat's 'vision of peace'

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States responded coolly to "The Palestinian vision of peace," an opinion piece by Yasser Arafat that appeared in last Sunday's New York Times.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said that while he is "pleased" that Arafat condemns terrorism, "now what we need is action against terrorists."

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres echoed the sentiment Sunday in New York, saying Arafat's condemnation of terrorist groups was a good start, but adding that Arafat needs to back up his words with deeds. "If Arafat will do what he has said, it is a good beginning," Peres said.

Declaring "we can't walk away" from the crisis in the Middle East, Powell said he was pleased that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had met top Palestinian leaders and intended to do so again in the future.

Speaking on CBS television's Face the Nation, Powell said he plans to meet soon with members of the Palestinian Authority to discuss efforts to get a ceasefire and resume peace negotiations.

Addressing the World Economic Forum in New York, Peres stressed that Arafat needs to rein in a number of armed militia groups if he wants to achieve his aspirations for an independent Palestinian state.

"Palestinians tell us we have many views in our country. Yes, we have many views, but one gun. They have one view but many guns, and the guns are killing the chances," Peres said. "If the Palestinians do not establish a single authority over all arms, there will never be a state or an authority."

Earlier, U.S. national security adviser Condoleezza Rice said the United States had not yet seen the "100 per cent effort" required to get the peace process going again.

"We've never said that there has to be 100 per cent result before we get back to pursuing a peace arrangement... But he has not done enough, and it is very clear that he can do more to disable the terrorist networks," Rice said.

She said Arafat must rein in attacks sponsored by members of "Hamas and Hezbollah elements around him." The Arafat article was timed for publication before the Feb. 7 talks between Sharon and U.S. President George W. Bush, who has said he is "disappointed" with Arafat's handling of militants.

In the article, Arafat reiterated what he would seek from an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord: "an independent and viable Palestinian state" sharing Jerusalem "as the capital of two states" and a "fair and just solution to the plight of Palestinian refugees."

He also condemned Palestinian "terrorist groups" that attack Israeli targets and said he is "determined to put an end to their activities."

Arafat said that 16 months into a Palestinian uprising against Israeli occupation, "Palestinians are ready to end the conflict."

In a swipe at Sharon, he wrote: "We are ready to sit down now with any Israeli leader, regardless of his history, to negotiate freedom for the Palestinians, a complete end of the occupation, security for Israel and creative solutions to the plight of the [Palestinian] refugees while respecting Israel's demographic concerns."

In an effort to defend himself, Arafat said "the personal attacks on me" that are "currently in vogue" provide Israelis with an "excuse to ignore their own role in creating the current situation."

An adviser to Sharon called the Arafat article a "publicity stunt."

Future bleak for Argentine Jewish schools

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — The financial crisis that sent Argentina into a tailspin at the end of last year has had a devastating effect on the nation's Jewish educational network.

Education experts predict there will be a "desertion rate" of 25 to 30 per cent from Jewish schools during the coming year, a dire future for what was once considered one of the best Jewish school networks in the world.

The network has attracted a consistently high percentage of Jewish children from the community, higher than most communities in the Diaspora.

Of a population of some 36,000 Jewish children of school age in Argentina, about 17,000 attended a Jewish school last year.

The network has produced its own textbooks and trained teachers and principals who went on to work elsewhere in Latin America.

In greater Buenos Aires alone, there are 82 Jewish schools – 37 kindergartens, 13 primary schools and 32 high schools.

But those totals could dwindle when the new school year begins in March.

Faced with financial hardship, only 50 per cent of the families that have expressed a wish to continue with Argentina's Jewish school system have paid registration fees.

According to Bernardo Kliksberg, president of the Latin American Jewish Congress' Human Development Committee, any desertions from the school network would be a loss for the Jewish world as a whole.

"It increases the spiritual and educational poverty of Jewish family life and it increases assimilation risks," Kliksberg said. "It is urgent to save the soul of every Jewish child."

Daniel Pomerantz, the administrative director of AMIA, the main Jewish institution in Buenos Aires, agrees that a major threat looms.

"With the crisis in the educational system, the Jewish community is in danger," he told JTA. "But not because of anti-Semitism. The problem is social and economic."

Kliksberg said that most of the desertions are "strictly due to reasons of poverty."

Even if schools reduce monthly fees, "families still have to be able to afford transportation, food and school supplies. And many cannot do it any longer," he said.

Batia Nemirovsky, director of the Central Council for Jewish Education in Argentina, said that the country's Jewish educational institutions traditionally have been supported by monthly fees of about $150 per family.

Nemirovsky said that many Jewish families used to pay more than the standard fee to help those that needed scholarships.

"But with the impoverishment process we are now going through, very few families can pay the standard fee," she said. At the same time, the "demand for scholarships is increasing. The slowness in paying is increasing, too."

Nemirovsky spoke of the need to guarantee children a Jewish education as families unable to afford the fees send their children to public school.

"We cannot let the children drop out of the system," she said.

In an effort to deal with the crisis, the Central Council is heading up a committee trying to find ways to reduce educational costs and free up money for scholarships.

The committee plans to organize a buying club to get better prices for school supplies, catering, security, insurance and transportation.

Since 1995, two new Jewish schools have opened in Argentina – but 10 have closed. Soon there may be an 11th: the Doctor Herzl Institute. Located in a working class neighbourhood of Buenos Aires known as Once, the school has taught students for approximately 100 years. It is the oldest Jewish school in the country.

After years with a student body of approximately 800, the institute closed its high school in 2000. Last year, the institute had only 250 students – 50 per cent of whom were on scholarship.

Officials say they are unsure whether they will open the school when classes begin in March.

Rosana Szteinhauz, director of the Jewish department of the institute's primary school, said that parents, teachers and former students are trying to find a way to keep the school afloat.

But finances may prevail over good intentions: the institute's debt is estimated at over $500,000 dollars. Making matters worse, only 34 families have paid next term's registration fees.

U.S. rejects EU proposal on Mideast conflict

European plan seen as form of pressure on the Americans

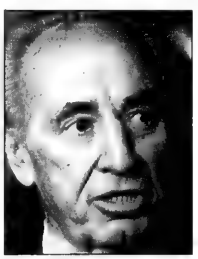
By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States has rejected a European plan for an international conference that would renew the political process toward a resolution of the Mideast conflict and would proceed alongside the implementation of security measures to ensure a ceasefire and fight terrorism.

European Union (EU) representatives Javier Solana and Miguel Moratinos raised the idea of a conference at a meeting last Thursday in Washington, D.C., attended by representatives of the United States, the EU, the United Nations and Russia.

As an alternative to an international conference, Solana suggested adopting a French plan for new elections in the West Bank and Gaza, which was formulated in consultation with senior officials in the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Both proposals were supported by the UN's Middle East envoy, Terje Larsen.



Shimon Peres met with Abu Ala, speaker of the PA parliament at the initiative of the EU.

Israel is opposed to both ideas and, according to well-placed sources in Jerusalem, "The European proposals will split the international community and will only serve as a reward and encouragement for the terror of [PA Chairman Yasser] Arafat."

Washington also opposed the Europeans' suggestions, with U.S. officials telling Solana and Moratinos this was the time to focus only on the security issues at hand and to apply co-ordinated pressure on the PA, which, U.S. officials said, is not taking the appropriate and required steps against terrorism.

The Americans also came out against a proposal that the United States, EU, UN and Russia make parallel demands on both the Israelis and the Palestinians.

Despite Washington's position, the Europeans did not give up, suggesting last Friday that it would sponsor the meeting between Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and the speaker of the PA parliament, Abu Ala. The two agreed.

Solana was unable to make the meeting, but Moratinos and an aide sat in on the talks for a while before leaving Peres and Abu Ala to themselves.

Israeli sources said this was the Europeans' way of telling Washington that if the United States did not increase its involvement in the process, the EU would embark on an independent policy and push the process forward on its own.

The Week in Israel

Jan. 28

• Security officials presented Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with a plan for increasing Jerusalem's security that calls for a system of physical and technological obstacles to prevent terrorists from infiltrating the city.

Jan. 29

• Palestinian gunmen opened fire on the southern Jerusalem neighborhood of Gilo. Six apartments, two civilian vehicles and an IDF position adjacent to the neighborhood were hit by gunfire coming from snipers in nearby Beit Jala. One resident was very lightly wounded by shards of broken glass.

Jan. 30

• Minister of Defence Binyamin Ben-Eliezer met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in the southern Sinai town of Sharm el Sheikh. Ben-Eliezer told his Egyptian host that he fears conflict with the Palestinians could lead to a regional war and that a "breakthrough" must be found, with the necessary pre-condition being a cessation of violence by the Palestinian Authority.

Jan. 31

•President Moshe Katsav presided over an official ceremony at Ben-Gurion Airport to mark the arrival of Torah scrolls and other sacred books sent to Israel by the Government of Lithuania. The shipment included several dozen Torah scrolls and 300 holy books confiscated by the Nazi regime during the Holocaust.

Feb. 1

• A senior military official told Ha'aretz that intelligence investigators confirm the Karine A, the ship carrying weapons that was intercepted by the IDF, was purchased by Hezbollah for $400,000 and that the Palestinian Authority paid $15 million for the weapons.

Israel finds common ground with India

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Later this year – a date has yet to be fixed – Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel and President Kocheril Raman Narayanan of India are expected to exchange reciprocal visits.

Their respective trips, designed to mark a decade of formal diplomatic relations, will enhance Israel's growing relationship with India.

Although India recognized Israel in 1948, the year of Israeli statehood, India maintained a frosty attitude toward Israel for decades.

In deference to its huge Muslim population, its membership in the non-aligned movement and its sympathy for the Arab cause, India did not actually establish diplomatic relations with Israel. And until quite recently, Israel had to make do with a consulate in Bombay rather than an embassy in India's capital, New Delhi. India, for its part, did not send diplomats to Israel.

The situation changed radically in 1992, when P.V. Narasimha Rao, the Indian prime minister, decided to upgrade links with Israel. Atal Bihari Vajpayee, India's current prime minister, consolidated them.

Since 1998, India and Israel have enjoyed flourishing bilateral relations. The volume of trade has increased dramatically – from several million to $1.2 billion (US) annually – and military co-operation has grown by leaps and bounds.

India's rapprochement with Israel, which parallels Israel's budding alliance with Turkey, a country which also once spurned Israel, is one of the most important developments in Israeli diplomatic history.

At least two factors account for India's about-face.

• The collapse of the Soviet Union, India's chief arms supplier, left India with an armoury of outdated weaponry. India turned to Israel, which has a knack for upgrading aging military equipment, particularly tanks and aircraft.

• Like Israel, India has a problem with Islamic terrorism, stemming from its confrontation with Pakistan over the disputed Kashmir region. As New Delhi well knows, India can learn from Israel's experience in dealing with Islamic terrorism and a hostile contiguous neighbour.

Given the harsh realities facing India, the military dimension of its relations with Israel have been pivotal.

This was plainly evident during Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' visit to India last month. (He was preceded by Amos Yaron, director-general of Israel's ministry of defence. Yaron's counterpart, Subir Dutta, visited Israel last July).

Peres, having flown to New Delhi a day after an Indian security delegation arrived in Tel Aviv, met with India's leadership to discuss a wide range of issues.

High on the agenda was India's possible purchase of Israel's Phalcon airborne-radar system. India may buy three Phalcons, worth more than $1 billion (US). The United States, however, has asked Israel to defer the sale. Last year, Washington vetoed a sale of Phalcons – which contain American components – to China.

Before the Phalcon deal came up for consideration, Israel sold Green Pine early warning stations to India for $400 million (US) and Barak missiles for $300 million (US). Israel is also refurbishing India's fleet of MIG 21s, MIG 29s and T-72 tanks. In addition, India has expressed an interest in Gil anti-tank missiles and in Elisra electronic warfare systems.

Reports suggest India and Israel may be jointly working to develop anti-ballistic missiles. Lansa, an Indian journal on strategic studies, claims that Israel is poised to replace Russia as India's main weapons supplier.

India and Israel have also been co-operating in counter-terrorism. Last March, after Jaswant Singh became India's first foreign minister to visit Israel, the two countries established a joint working group on terrorism.

In Peres' talks with Defence Minister George Fernandes in January, Israel and India exchanged views on terrorism.

According to Jane's Terrorism & Security Monitor, Israel is heavily involved in helping India combat Islamic militants in Kashmir.

True or not, India is certainly cozying up to Israel.

Haider apologizes to Jewish leader

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — Austrian far-right leader Joerg Haider apologized last week to the leader of the country's Jewish community and withdrew derogatory remarks about him.

Jewish leader Ariel Muzicant told a news conference he had dropped legal action against Haider in return for written apologies for comments widely condemned as anti-Semitic.

In a speech in February of last year, Haider made a punning reference to Muzicant's first name and an international brand of washing powder, saying: "I don't understand how someone whose name is Ariel can have so much dirt sticking to him." The expression in German can imply a dishonest past.

Known internationally for controversial remarks about Austria's Nazi past – for which he also apologized – Haider made a number of allegations against Muzicant in the speech. These included that the Jewish leader had stabbed Austria in the back during negotiations to compensate Holocaust victims, that he had used his political connections to help his own business and that he did not belong "in the spectrum of democratic forces".

A statement issued last week and approved by lawyers for both sides said: "Dr. Haider has withdrawn all legally incriminating allegations against Dr. Muzicant, in separate formal declarations, with an expression of regret and apology." In the first of five declarations he must now issue, Haider said he had no reason to doubt Muzicant's honor and undertook not to repeat his remarks in the future.

Relishing controversy and confrontation, Haider has also heaped abuse on other European leaders, once describing French President Jacques Chirac as a "pocket-sized Napoleon."

Austria's EU partners, who have questioned the democratic credentials of Haider's Freedom Party, imposed political sanctions on the new Austrian government after it was sworn in, but lifted them in September 2000 after an EU-appointed panel gave the country a clean bill of human rights health.

Israel's Remarkable Sea

Ok, so you know that everyone floats on top of Israel's Dead Sea, one of the world's most famous tourist attractions. That's easy. Now try these fast facts to impress party-goers during the next cocktail conversation.

- The Dead Sea is the lowest point on earth, 400 kilometres below sea level.
- It's not a "sea" at all. The Dead Sea is really a small lake.
- Sunshine warms the Dead Sea for an average of 330 days or 90% of the year.
- Researchers frequently find new health benefits to dipping in the Dead Sea and breathing the air around it.
- The Dead Sea contains 21 minerals and 8% more oxygen than anywhere else in the world.
- The black Dead Sea mud that offers your skin such a comfortable feeling is made up of minerals, organic components and pure earth.
- The ancient Egyptians used bitumen from the Dead Sea to embalm their mummies.
- Mark Anthony conquered the Dead Sea region, just for Cleopatra.
- You can choose from 15 hotels and 4,000 rooms within a five kilometer radius of the Dead Sea.
- Best of all, the Dead Sea is merely half an hour from Jerusalem and less than an hour from Tel Aviv.

Next week, the magic of Masada.

Surreal Gourmet helps you eat like royalty

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bob Blumer, cookbook author and host of Food Network Canada's the Surreal Gourmet, believes it's easy to live well beyond your means.

"If you learn to use simple, fresh ingredients, you can eat well and easily elevate your quality of life," he says.

Blumer, whose latest book is Off the Eaten Path: Inspired Recipes for Adventurous Cooks is originally from Montreal. He learned how to cook while he was a student at the University of Western Ontario, "so I would not have to do the dishes."

His food career began in 1991 when he took time out from his job managing Canadian singer and songwriter Jane Siberry to write his first cookbook, The Surreal Gourmet: Real Food for Pretend Chefs. In it, he promoted his philosophy of being able to live well despite having little money. "I have always had a hedonistic desire to eat and live well every moment of my life."

He wrote his second book, The Surreal Gourmet Entertains, "in order to demonstrate that anyone with a dysfunctional kitchen and mismatched place settings can throw a killer dinner party."

In a telephone interview from his home in Los Angeles, Blumer says he grew up with such "traditional staples" as pot roast, turkey and chicken soup.

"I see food a little differently, however. To me, the presentation is as important as the taste."

His specialty, he says, is "making food that looks like other food but isn't. I have taken what is really pound cake and raspberry syrup and make it look like french fries and ketchup.

"I have also puréed food and presented it on an artist's palette. This past Chanukah, I created a dreidel out of a yam. These are dinner party tricks; at the heart of it all, though, is good food and good flavour."

He gets his ideas from everywhere, he says. "It's what I do; I always think about food."

A favourite of his, he says, is extreme cuisine. "A chapter of my latest book is devoted to such meals as salmon poached in the dishwasher: Use the normal cycle – cool dry is unacceptable because it preserves heat, and the pots and pans setting tends to overcook the fish."

Blumer's "basic pressed-cheese sandwich" is made by placing cheese between two slices of bread, wrapping the sandwich in foil and after preheating an iron to the linen setting, pressing it down for about three minutes. "When you are ready for a greater challenge, add grilled eggplant or roasted bell pepper."

He includes a recipe for "diced" fish. "Life is a crapshoot. But the odds are good that your lucky guests will be impressed by this fish dish," he writes.

DICED FISH

1 20 oz. fillet of a firm-fleshed fish cut 1¼ in. thick
1 tsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tbsp. whole black peppercorns

Preheat oven to 400. With a very sharp knife, cut fish into 8 1¼ in. cubes. Rub oil over 2 12x16 in. sheets of aluminum foil. Turn up the edges. Place half the cubes in the centre of each piece of foil. Drizzle with lime juice. Add salt and pepper. Seal packages and bake for 10 minutes.

Remove from foil and use the tip of a paring knife to make small holes for the peppercorns. Gently press peppercorns into holes. Spoon sauce onto warmed plates and top with two dice. Serve.

CILANTRO SAUCE

1 tbsp. butter
2 leeks, white and pale green section only, finely chopped
1 jalapeno chili, seeds and membranes removed and diced
2 garlic cloves minced
1 cup vegetable stock
1½ cups lightly packed fresh cilantro
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
3 tbsp. sour cream

Melt butter in sauté pan. Add the leeks, jalapeno and garlic and sauté for about 5 minutes or until the leeks are translucent but not brown.

Reduce heat to medium and add the stock. Simmer, uncovered for 15 minutes. Adjust heat as required to maintain simmer. The liquid should reduce by half.

Remove from heat and let cool. Transfer to a blender or food processor and add the cilantro, lime juice, salt and pepper. Purée until smooth. Reheat just before serving. Stir in the sour cream at the last minute.

As the Danforth's only three-star restaurant, Pan has been pleasing patrons for eight years. Maintaining this high standard, owner Peter Kyriacou and chef John Jackson have added zest to an already compelling and eclectic Mediterranean menu. Noteworthy among the new offerings is Atlantic salmon stuffed with mushrooms and baby spinach, wrapped in a delicate layer of phyllo pastry. Or perhaps you'd prefer jumbo quail, stuffed with sausage, mushroom and shallots, finished with pearl onion and a dark roast chicken and red wine reduction. At Pan, creative flair and elegance are a given. The atmosphere is intimate and candle-lit, great for Valentine's Day, but vivacious, with lively music.

Its decor beautifully updated, its menu revitalized, Christina's has recaptured the essence of fine Greek dining and the magnetic ambience it once enjoyed. Portions are generous, prices very reasonable, the wine selection greatly expanded. Fittingly, this rebirth coincides with the return of Christina's original chef.

The oft-used term "Home Cooking" rings true here. From the dolmades to the Greek salads, from the succulent leg of lamb to the Kolokithokefiedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness — every bite is heavenly. Concert showcases Yiddish artists

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — The 33rd Yiddishland Café concert at the Workmen's Circle auditorium presented stories, fables and songs by famous Yiddish artists and paid tribute to Yiddish women poets and composers.

Freelance producer Chaya Thalenberg read fables by the late local writer Peretz Miransky and Romanian Yiddish fabulist Eliezer Steinbarg (1880-1932), including Steinbarg's Di Shpiz Un Di Nodl and Reb Berl's Hoyzen. Reb Berl's Hoyzen is a story about a rabbi's wife, daughter and mother-in-law, who at first claim to be too busy to fix the rabbi's trousers, but then take an inch off the length while he is asleep.

Thalenberg also read and acted out two allegorical stories by Y.L. Peretz, whose humorous fable about Di frume kats was a big hit with the audience.

Violinist Michael Ziskind and accompanist Nina Shapilsky performed songs from Fiddler on the Roof. Lenka Lichtenberg, a music professor at Ryerson University, sang works by contemporary composers Chava Alberstein and B. Schaechter-Gottesman, as well as a number called Du, du by Aliza Greenblatt, the mother-in-law of folksinger Woody Guthrie.

Lichtenberg was scheduled to sing these songs at a women's festival in Argentina, but the festival was postponed because of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Lichtenberg, who brought husband Rubin Cohen and children Hannah, 11, Rachel, 9, and Benjamin, 7, to sing with her in her closing number, Ver es hot, dedicated the folksong Ver hot aza yingele to Benjamin. When she referred to her daughters as "maidlen," the audience corrected her, saying, "maidlech."

The Workmen's Circle cultural committee is presenting five Yiddish films, the first being Der Purimshpiler by Itzik Manger, Feb. 17 at 7:30 p.m.

The evening was organized by Nochem Reinhartz and his wife Henya. The next café concert will be April 7, Reinhartz said.

TVO revisits Isaac Stern's 1979 trip to China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1979, China was just starting to emerge from self-imposed isolation and doctrinaire communism.

In the spirit of that hopeful mood, the Chinese government invited Isaac Stern, the superb American violinist, to visit the country for three weeks.

Accompanied by a pianist, and several of his children, Stern gave a series of memorable concerts and master classes. He also visited the Beijing Opera Company, whose dancers and acrobats dazzled him with deft performances.

Stern's trip was an enormous success, and, fortunately, it was filmed by an expert camera crew.

From Mao to Mozart: Isaac Stern in China, which won an Academy Award in 1981 for best documentary, will by broadcast by TVOntario on Thursday, Feb. 14 at 10 p.m. and again on Sunday, Feb. 17 at 1 a.m.

In this excellent film, Stern, white-haired, wizened and fatherly, comes across not just as an extraordinary musician and gifted teacher, but as an avuncular cultural ambassador for the United States.

From Mao to Mozart opens as he steps off an airplane in Beijing and says he is looking forward to this tour with "great expectations."

Isaac Stern at a master class in China.

One can well understand his anticipation. At the time, China was in transition from communism to capitalism. The Cultural Revolution, which had torn the country apart in a spasm of anti-Western rhetoric and violence, was still a fresh, bitter memory.

Banners of Mao Tse-tung and Joseph Stalin festooned Beijing, the streets of the capital were jammed with cyclists rather than cars and the Chinese countryside looked as if it had not changed in decades.

This was the China that greeted Stern and his entourage in June 1979.

Much to his delight, he found a renewed interest in Western classical music, which had been banned during the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution.

In friendly and touching encounters at conservatories with young, upcoming musicians, Stern discovered there was no shortage of talent in China.

Nevertheless, they had much to learn. "The Chinese approach to Western music is somewhat limited," he observes diplomatically after listening to several violinists.

His critique is that their technique is old-fashioned and that they are not accustomed to playing with passion. Yet, he acknowledges, they are quick studies.

At classes with awed pupils, Stern explains how they can best coax beautiful, sonorous music out of their instruments.

"The violin must be part of the body, like another arm," he says mantra-like.

The tradition of Western concert music is most entrenched in Shanghai (a city that harboured European Jewish refugees during World War II).

But even here, Stern's pianist, David Golub, cannot find a suitable piano for a concert. After much discussion and cajoling, a proper piano magically turns up.

Stern's appearance at a Shanghai conservatory is probably the highlight of the movie.

The pre-teen musicians here are extraordinarily talented and dedicated, and Stern is clearly impressed.

Still more poignant, Stern meets the director of the conservatory, a well-spoken man who was confined to a malodorous closet during the Cultural Revolution's darkest years.

Hardly batting an eyelash, the poor man describes the humiliating treatment he was subjected to for 14 long months.

The Cultural Revolution had a profound effect on budding musicians, too.

Stern learns that violinists aged eight to 11 show more promise than their older counterparts. China's political upheavals forced them to abandon the violin during a critical learning period.

Aware of China's turbulent history, Stern urges them to play with their hearts and minds. Technical excellence alone, he declares, will not suffice.

Stern, as the director of one conservatory says, left a deep impression on the people of China. From Mao to Mozart has a similar impact.

MIRVISH TRIES ON ZADIE'S SHOES

Last year at this time, a play that premiered at the Factory Theatre was well on its way to becoming the surprise hit of the season.

Zadie's Shoes was written by Adam Pettle and featured his brother, actor Jordan Pettle, in a lead role. It won rave reviews and was sold out for every performance.

The play, you might say, has "legs": Mirvish Productions secured the rights to include it in its present theatrical season, alongside more famous theatrical fare such as The Graduate (presently on stage with Kathleen Turner as the evil Mrs. Robinson), Syncopation, Mamma Mia! and The Lion King.

Zadie's Shoes, with Jordan Pettle, is scheduled to open March 23 at the Winter Garden Theatre for a seven-week run. For tickets, phone 416-872-1212.

Architect Wins Award: Too often, the people who design the structures that are the most visible emblems of our community and our civilization remain invisible themselves. How many Torontonians, for example, recognize the name Jerome Markson?

Many of us are familiar with the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre complex of buildings in north Toronto that includes the Leah Posluns Theatre, the Koffler Gallery and the Lipa Green Building. Many are also acquainted with the nearby Holocaust Memorial. But how many know that these structures originated on Markson's drafting table? His firm, Markson Borooah Hodgson Architects, is also responsible for renovations and additions to Beth Sholom Synagogue and the First Narayever Synagogue.

The firm's credits outside of the Jewish community, both in Toronto and farther afield, are extensive and impressive. Locally, they include the innovative Market Square condominiums by the waterfront and the Frederick Varley Art Gallery of Markham, which the Globe and Mail described as "a minor masterpiece." Markson has also completed urban design projects from Dallas to Kuala Lampur.

The Toronto-based architect, who studied architecture at the U of T, has been honoured with many awards over his 45-year career. The latest is the Toronto Arts Award for Architecture & Design, which Arts Toronto presented to him at a recent gala event. The jury commended him for having left "an indelible mark of excellence and imagination on our city's buildings."

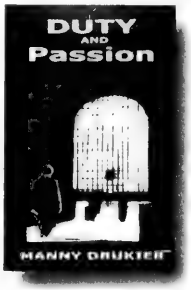
What's Happening at Israel's: The Shaarei Shomayim book club meets to discuss The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon, by Richard Zimler, Sunday, Feb. 10, 8 p.m.

Also, author Manny Drukier reads from his new fictional work, Duty and Passion, about the life of a survivor and the trial of a Holocaust denier. Himself a survivor, Drukier is the former publisher of the Idler magazine and owns the Idler's Pub on Davenport Road. Refreshments; free admission. Monday, Feb. 11, 7:30 p.m.



Both events take place at Israel's Judaica, 897 Eglinton Ave. W., one block west of Bathurst. 416-256-1010.

AIDS and Art: Planning is already under way for the Home and Style Studio Tour & Sale, an annual fund-raising event that promotes regional artists as it raises funds for local HIV and AIDS organizations.

Entering its third year, the Studio Tour is the brainchild of Jeffrey Stolberg, a Toronto-based designer and photographer. During the event, the public is invited into the private studios of artists and designers across the city. "You can meet with the artists who create glasswork, textiles, pottery and ceramics, and even chat with some design celebrities," explains volunteer Carson Phillips.

Organizers recently launched a Web site and announced the opening of a contest with a top prize of a trip for two to Bermuda and a second prize of a limousine tour of the event with accommodation at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

The contest has already begun, even though the Studio Tour does not commence until late September. Details at www.studiotouronline.com

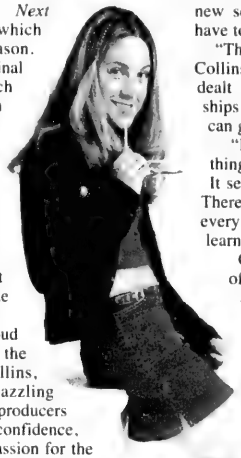
Fifteen-year-old enjoys being the evil one on Degrassi

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — She's vindictive, manipulative and proud of it.

For 15-year-old Lauren Collins, it means she's doing her job.

Collins plays the conniving character of eighth grader Paige Michalchuk on CTV's Degrassi: The Next Generation, which debuted this season. Just like the original Degrassi, which stopped production 12 years ago, the new Degrassi is taking a new generation of teens by storm, and Collins is glad to be part of it – even though she's the meanest of 11 starlets in the 15-part series.



"I'm really proud to be part of the show," says Collins, who has been dazzling casting agents and producers with her maturity, confidence, good nature and passion for the industry since before the age of 10. These characteristics have landed her parts in a variety of commercials and television shows, such as In a Heartbeat, which hit it big in the United States.

"My first reaction when I learned I got the part was that this could be really big, like the original. It was scary but I was really happy," she says, adding that the role helps her teach teen audiences about the issues they will face in the coming years.

"It's a show for teens that deals with the issues everyday teens have to deal with in a realistic way," Collins says. "They don't blow it out of proportion. Sometimes they deal with the bigger issues, like in one episode, one of the characters finds out that her father is gay.

Lauren Collins

"That's obviously not something that happens to every kid, but they'll make up for it in the sense that they'll deal with other issues that everyone has to deal with, such as rumours. I think that they've found a healthy median," she says of the show's behind-the-scenes team.

One of the major issues dealt with in the new series that kids in the 1980s didn't have to confront was technology.

"The Internet is a big theme," says Collins. "The one-hour reunion special dealt with Internet stalkers and relationships over the Internet and the dangers it can get you into.

"I think that was a really important thing that had to be dealt with right away. It set the tone for the episodes to come. There's a good moral that comes out of every show and it's important for kids to learn them."

Collins's character is a major conduit of some other important issues, such as underage drinking and being a good friend. "In one episode, Paige gets one of her best friends drunk and steals her boyfriend. She's so mean. I couldn't imagine doing that to one of my friends."

In addition to helping teach her television audiences, Collins also works with children by directing a group of kids between grades 3 and 5 in a community theatre production of Grease. "I used to be in the plays and now I'm directing some of the younger kids, which is so much fun – they're so cute," she gushes.

She thinks the most important thing she can teach her young actors is discipline, something she's developed over the years.

"I work in an adult world so I can't always act like a kid – I have to be prepared when I come to set and know my lines. I can't be goofing around."

And while she has to be responsible and mature, going downtown by herself to auditions and learning to balance academics and acting, she says she definitely likes being a teen.

"My friends are really important to me. When I'm on set, it's hard to give them all the time I want to, so when I'm not working I try to spend as much time with them as I can. We like going to the mall, seeing movies and hanging out at each others' houses."

And sometimes, Collins just likes to "veg out."

"That's what I really like about the show," she says. "They like real kids. I don't feel pressure to stay super skinny and perfect... I'd never stop [eating foods like pizza]. If I was ever pressured to stop that then I'd know it would be a sign for me to not act anymore. I want to stay myself. It's really important to me."

At times, it can be difficult to stay grounded, but she's learned to cope. "I don't want to be one of those kids with a big head and a huge ego. It doesn't appeal to me. My friends know that I hate talking about [acting]. I get so embarrassed when I'm asked about my job and I try to quickly change the subject."

But working in television does have its perks. "I definitely want to save my money. My parents are telling me to save it and I know that's what I want to do – for school, but I really want to get a car."

Though the cast has not yet heard whether CTV will bring the show back for a second season, Collins says she's excited about the prospect of returning as Paige and about the chance to pass on advice and morals to audiences as characters deal with the issues.

Business Profile

Ambitious siblings anchor film production company

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A brother-and-a-sister filmmaking team is giving Canadian viewers a tantalizing taste of pop culture.

Shari and Robert Cohen, along with partner Robin Neinstein, are the principals of Toronto-based Media Headquarters, which specializes in documentaries and features on the arts, history and sociology.

They have made films for the National Film Board of Canada, the CBC and specialty channels such as History, Discovery, Bravo! and the Life Network.

Their latest production, The Travellers: This Land is Your Land, an endearing portrait of a great Canadian folk group, made its debut at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last spring.

Another recent production, The Big Show, is a glitzy look at the Toronto International Film Festival as its marked its 25th anniversary.

Now, in a fresh burst of creativity, they plan to start shooting two major features in March.

Shari, 29, is blunt in describing Media Headquarters' mission. "We do high-quality, special event programming, which goes against the grain of cheap digital programming."

Robert, 26, is just as emphatic. "Our niche is stories told through the lens of the new generation, our generation."

Their company, established in 1997, was originally known as Cohen Siblings. But after Neinstein, a friend, came on board in 2000, there was clearly a need for a name change.

> 'Won the Ross McLean Award for Best Documentary'

The trio bring their backgrounds in film, theatre and journalism to the table.

Shari attended the United Synagogue Day School (USDS), studied at Forest Hill Collegiate and earned a degree in fine arts from the University of Toronto.

Drawn to film by a U of T course on experimental video, she then studied journalism at Ryerson, where she won the Ross McLean Award for Best Documentary.

Shari then worked as an editorial assistant and news writer at CBC Newsworld, and as an intern and reporter at a Peterborough, Ont., TV station.

Television journalism, given its time constraints, was not for her. "You can't tell the whole story, there's so much more," she explained. "I found that very frustrating."

In 1995, she produced Animal Crackers, a wry documentary about eccentric pet owners.

Her big break came with Smile with your Eyes, a touching documentary about a girl with a medical condition that prevented her from smiling and a surgeon who fixed her problem.

Robert, who also attended USDS and graduated from Forest Hill Collegiate, directed plays while studying drama at McGill University. His theatre productions ran the gamut from Ten Lost Years to Cabaret.

Moving into film, he and Neinstein made The Cabaret Project, a "docu-comedy." It won first prize at the McGill Film Festival and was screened at the Montreal World Film Festival.

Back in Toronto, with a McGill degree in hand, Robert worked for a Toronto theatre company.

At that point, he and Shari joined forces to produce Atom Egoyan: A Road to Elsewhere, which chronicles film director Egoyan's foray into contemporary opera.

"The opportunity to make a documentary about Atom couldn't be missed," Robert said.

It cost just under $200,000 to make, using funds from CBC, Rogers Documentary Fund, Bravo! and local arts patrons Joey and Toby Tanenbaum.

"That was the beginning," said Robert, referring to his professional association with Shari. "Luckily, it was well received."

Robert is keeping his options open about returning to theatre one day. "But right now," he hastened to add,"film is my addiction."

Robert and Shari, whose father is a dermatologist and whose mother is an art teacher and photographer, consider Neinstein, 26, an "honorary sibling."

After finishing McGill, Neinstein received an MA in motion picture production from the University of Southern California.

Then, honing his administrative and creative skills, he worked for Beacon Pictures, DreamWorks SKG, 20th Century Fox and Fox Searchlight, where, in a coup, he acquired the Academy Award winning Boys Don't Cry.

Shari and Robert Cohen with partner Robin Neinstein (right).

"He's taken our company to a new level," Shari said of Neinstein's Hollywood experience.

At Media Headquarters, the threesome have meshed remarkably well. Shari is the executive producer, while directing and producing are Robert's and Neinstein's preserves.

As for his working relationship with his sister, Robert, who is single, said, "We get along really, really well."

Shari heartily agreed. "We work together to solve problems. There is a certain amount of mutual trust. It makes for a happy place to work."

At the moment, the partners are busy making final preparations to shoot a three-part series on modern marriage and a film entitled Le Mozart Noir.

The latter is on the life of St. Georges, a largely forgotten 18th century composer whose father was a French nobleman and whose mother was a Haitian slave. One of Marie Antoinette's lovers, he suffered terribly from racism.

Media Headquarters has several other projects in development.

The Wedding Gift, based on a short story, is set in Nova Scotia and revolves around a romance between a woman and a priest.

Chump Change turns on a young aspiring writer faced with a momentous decision: Should he follow his dream and try to be a novelist, or should he stick to his day job?

How to Rule the World charts the phenomenon of globalization.

Looking still further ahead, Robert savours what may lie in store for Media Headquarters."We're very excited about our possibilities," he said. Piping in, Shari observed, "There aren't too many people of our age doing this."

The pair are quite ambitious. "We want to be a major provider of film and TV programming," Robert said. "[Both] in Canada and internationally."

Mount Sinai introduces a number of high-tech tools

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Code Blue. Cardiac arrest! CPR! Get that breathing tube down! Defibrillator on! Clear! Whew – sinus rhythm.

The patient was saved. Everyone on the emergency team performed perfectly. Just one thing – the "patient" was a mannequin, the symptoms and results simulated on a computer, and the emergency procedure done, not on a hospital ward, but in the Surgical Skills Lab of Mount Sinai Hospital.

The mannequin is only one of the latest high-tech tools currently being introduced at the hospital. For junior residents and medical students, the mannequin is a particularly good teaching tool, as it reacts as a human being would, but with no risk to anybody.

It can also be used to simulate emergency situations, so that nurses, doctors, and technicians can practise both their individual skills and how to work as a team. The "body" can be moved, for instance, to the cafeteria, the emergency room or a patient room, to make the experience even more real.

The mannequin is an adult male, but there are plans to eventually have a female and even a child.

Zane Cohen, surgeon-in-chief of Mount Sinai, introduced the demonstrations to a goggle-eyed group of reporters and members of the Leadership Sinai group, which is raising funds for some of the new technology.

Hermes is a computerized, voice-controlled internal camera that can be set up during surgery and monitored from a computer station in the same room, or even in another city or country. It can turn camera lights on and off, zoom in and out, or move up or down.

Cohen explained that with this technology, experienced surgical staff can proctor others, help at a remote site, teach new techniques or mentor someone who was trained at a major centre and then returned to a smaller one. It can also be used with teleconferencing to demonstrate new techniques or compare ways of handling surgical problems or procedures at several different hospitals.

Zeus is another computerized tool for the operating room. One of its latest components is a robotic arm, controlled either by voice or a touchpad. It can perform all kinds of manoeuvres, including searching a body cavity, and even stitching.

"Its movements are more precise [than a human surgeon's] and so it can do things that can't be done with hand-held instruments. As well, it overcomes the natural tremor of the hand," Cohen explained. As a result, more advanced endoscopic surgery can be done.

The instrument can be changed without disturbing the patient, and can be easily disengaged in case of emergency or power failure.

A surgeon sits at an ergonomically sound computer console and manipulates the arm from there. He can also speak to personnel to direct their movements.

Zeus and Hermes can be combined as a teaching tool. Surgical residents demonstrated colonoscopy, where the arm can be used to examine the colon, with pictures sent back and shown on a monitor for use by both the student and the supervisor.

Doctors demonstrate how to deal with a cardiac arrest using a mannequin at Mount Sinai Hospital.

While this process can be used on patients, it can only scan for polyps or tumors. Regular colonoscopy can also remove polyps, a procedure that is essential to prevent colo-rectal cancer.

At the moment, the new technology is used as a teaching tool and in gastro-intestinal investigations and procedures. Cohen said that eventually it will be used by surgeons in other fields, and in other medical procedures, emergency medicine, anesthesia and nursing ("if a nurse can save 30 seconds in treating a cardiac arrest, it could save the patient's life"), as well as by respiratory therapists, medical and nursing students and paramedics.

The College of Physicians and Surgeons considers this new technology important for maintaining professional competence, because surgeons and other medical personnel can be monitored as they perform various procedures, he said.

The distance over which the combined technology can work was demonstrated by a hook-up from a site in Santa Barbara, Calif.

All God's creatures

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Many times people don't think very much of those who are little. They think that they don't know anything, or that they are undependable. Children are often treated this way.

This is not a new way for people to behave. In fact, according to The Littlest Pair, by Sylvia Rouss, illustrated by Holly Hannon (Pitsopany Press, 2001), it even happened when Noah built the ark.

All the animals watched, "wide-eyed, in awe," as Noah built an ark, as God had commanded him to do. When he was finished, Noah explained that there would be a great flood and that "you won't find a dry place to stand."

All the animals lined up, two of each kind, to go into the ark, so that they would be safe.

But when the littlest pair arrived, everyone got upset. Why? Because the littlest pair were termites.

Now, if you know anything about termites, you will know that they can be dangerous to have around. They eat wood, sometimes so much wood that they can make a piece of furniture, or even a whole building, fall apart. Including an ark.

All the animals panicked. "Somebody dooo something.!" begged the cow with a moo. "The lion began pacing and started to roar." And as for the spider, "Her heart was aflutter. Her legs began shaking."

You can imagine how the poor termites felt when the other animals began yelling at them. They started to cry, and got very sad. Luckily, Noah ignored what the animals were saying, and welcomed the termites onto the ark.

A lucky thing it was, too.

CHUBBY & HOTDOG

Hotdog, what is all that noise upstairs?
It's Chubby trying out his new ultimate gregor!
PURIM

You see, when it started raining, all the animals started to slip and stumble and tumble all over the place. Even Noah couldn't figure out what to do.

Well, guess who saved the day. That's right – the termites. "We can make sawdust to give you some traction./Just say the word and we'll spring into action."

That's just what they did. Noah gave them some leftover wood, and the termites chewed it all up until it became sawdust. There was enough sawdust to line everyone's stall so that no one would slip and hurt themselves.

Everyone felt very badly for the way they had treated the termites. " 'We're sorry,' they said to the littlest pair. 'We weren't too nice. We were very unfair.' "

There is a lot that you can learn from The Littlest Pair – not to judge, to be kind to those who are different from you and to give everyone a chance. After all, as Noah says, "We're all God's creatures and to God, we all matter."

But this book isn't just a way to teach lessons. The colours are lovely, with bright yellows, oranges, purples and blues, and all the animals have really cute faces. I especially like the snake, who has a big smile on his face.

I also like that the animals come on board the ark carrying suitcases.

The whole book is written in rhyme, which you will really enjoy. For instance, "The elephant almost fell off of the Ark./ And right up his trunk slid a startled aardvark."

the Queen

based on the Midrash

Pouran ran through the hallway, bearing the golden tray laden with almonds, dried apricots, fish, grapes, and two pitas. She reached the Queen's room and knocked.

"Come in," came the voice from inside, "there's so much to do!"

Pouran entered. The Queen sat on a luxurious sofa, embroidering a small cushion. She was always busy! Not like that last queen, who sat around all day screaming out orders without getting up or doing anything on her own.

The Queen looked up and exclaimed, "Oh, the grapes!" Pouran, already used to the Queen's unvarying hectic schedule, brought out the grape press.

"Is Her Majesty sure she doesn't want me to press the grapes?" she asked, already knowing the answer.

"Of course not," the Queen energetically replied. "I'll do it myself. Pouran, you know what to do."

Pouran went to the inlaid walnut cabinet, removed the ornate silver candlesticks and began polishing them. Out of the corner of her eye, she watched her Majesty the Queen, knowing exactly what would happen. Now she's going to cram the grapes into the press, she thought. Now she's going to pull down the lever. Now she's going to splatter bright purple grape juice all over her beautiful white dress... Pouran winced as the Queen did just that.

The Queen carefully poured her juice into a large decanter. What eccentricities the Queen had! Squeezing her own grape juice! Wasn't the juice from the royal winery fresh enough? Pouran went to the wardrobe, and sighed as she took out another elegant, beaded white dress. I only work here once a week, and she has to do this every time?

The Queen changed into the new dress while Pouran cleaned grape juice puddles off the table and covered it with a sparkling white tablecloth. She set out bowls of fragrant condiments, salt and pepper, placed the two pitas in their handwoven basket, and put out a wine goblet and a porcelain dish. Finally, she set candles into the candlesticks. The late afternoon sun streamed through the window. "Pouran, you may return in two hours to clear the dishes." Pouran obediently complied, leaving the room and carrying the empty tray back to the kitchen.

Manijeh ran through the hallway, bearing the golden tray laden with apples, olives, dates, eggs, and two pitas. She reached the Queen's room and knocked.

"Come in," came the voice from inside.
